Abstract:

The article investigates the im/politeness lexicon in mid-nineteenth century Romanian, based on the analysis of a literary corpus (belonging to the Forty-Eighter writers). The observations try to account for the diachronic variability of im/politeness appraisal in the Romanian Principalities. The results based on the mid-nineteenth century corpus are compared with those of our previous studies on im/politeness in the Romanian princely courts (seventeenth–early eighteenth century chronicles corpus). The article focuses on the relationships between im/politeness and emotion, intentionality, self image, tracing the marks of a politeness continuum.

Keywords:

Politeness, impoliteness, metacommunicative, emotion, intentionality.

1. Theoretical and methodological aspects

The article aims to highlight the relationships between im/politeness and such aspects as emotion, intentionality, self image, tracing the marks of a politeness continuum, in mid-nineteenth century Romanian. The analysis is based on a literary corpus (belonging to the Forty-Eighter writers). Starting from the characters' and the narrator's commentaries regarding in/appropriate interpersonal behaviour, the paper aims to account for the diachronic relativity of the im/politeness evaluations and to reconstruct historically situated practices (Kádár 2014) in the Romanian Principalities. In this study, im/politeness is viewed from the perspective of historical pragmatics (Jucker 1995; Jucker & Taavitsainen 2010; Culpeper & Kádár 2010).

The analysis favours a first order im/politeness approach (im/politeness₁), thus the interpretation and comments of the participants regarding interaction will be more important than the second order, i. e. theoretical, perspective. A first order im/politeness approach is mainly concerned with the participants' evaluation of behavioural elements. We shall consider what is evaluated by the fictional instances of the texts (characters and narrators) as in/adequate for the interpersonal relationships in a given communicative situation (complying with/violating expectations); we shall also focus on a positive or negative relational management, sometimes triggering positive or negative emotions. 'Politeness' and 'impoliteness' will be used as theoretical classificatory terms in order to account for the discursive phenomena.

Metacommunicative aspects are a matter of reflexive, metapragmatic awareness (Verschuere 1999, 2000, 2012). Within the social practice, individuals have different degrees of awareness, depending both on their cognitive abilities and attention to stimuli; one can suggest that awareness is both attentional and intentional. The metacommunicative aspects refer to "reflexive interpretations and evaluations of social actions and meanings", including the participants' use of the im/politeness lexicon (Kádár & Haugh 2013: 186-187). Our way of referring to metacommunicative aspects overlaps with "classificatory" politeness (Eelen 2001) and "metacommunicative expressions" (Taavitsainen & Jucker 2008, Jucker & Taavitsainen 2014). It has been noticed that an "abrupt" or "brutal" transformation of the social practice (to which politeness belongs) leads to "conceptualisations or discourses of politeness that do not resemble at all their previous state" (Kádár & Haugh 2013: 171); thus, the process of changing social norms is a relevant stimulus capturing the individuals' attention and involving salient awareness.

Even if it favours a first order perspective on im/politeness, our approach does not neglect the theoretical perspective. The characters' reasonable choices and personal interest, the dependence of (non) verbal behaviour evaluation on social norms (Culpeper 2011) and on the "sociality rights" (Spencer-Oatey 2007; Culpeper 2011) will be also observed. We have in mind a combination of the uptake (highly important from an im/politeness₁ perspective—Locher & Watts 2005; Locher & Watts 2008: 80) with intentionality (as a post-factum construct—Culpeper 2011: 49). We shall also observe how the image of the self is influenced by the interactional flow and the conversational history (Spencer-Oatey 2007).

The mid-nineteenth century corpus consists of literary texts of some important authors, the so-called 'forty-eighters' (V. Alecsandri, D. Bolintineanu, C. Negruzzi, I. Ghica, M. Kogălniceanu, I. Heliade-Rădulescu, etc.); these writers closely observe the socio-cultural and language changes. Studying characters' and narrator's evaluations within a literary corpus involves acknowledging the fact that everything is filtered by a more or less aware author, biased in many ways (by his literary, socio-cultural, etc. background). What connects the authors included in the corpus is the fact that they form a generation (they are more or less the same age, they publish in the same literary journals, they have common socio-political goals, they are friends), they could be seen as a network or "discursive community" (Jucker & Kopaczyk 2013). The selected texts are plays, novels, short prose, memoirs, literary correspondence, original writings or adaptations of (usually) French texts, illustrating mainly the romantic literary ideology. The data were manually retrieved, according to the so called 'philological method'. The time frame taken into account is, roughly, 1830-1870.

2. Historical and cultural context

Situated in a region ("neighbourhood") of "competing and never friendly great powers" (Hitchins 2014: 22), the Romanian principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia had an Eastern political and cultural model, inherited from Byzantium and influenced by the Ottoman Empire. Western influence (mainly French) started since the Phanariot period (1711/1716-1821): Phanariot princes were admirers of the Enlightenment philosophy and of French literature, the young elite was educated by French professors. Yet, the eighteenth century accentuated, for some aristocrats, the orientalism, the way of life was still almost medieval/feudal, in contrast with the dynamic West (Boia 2002). After 1821, a quite rapid and radical opening of the Romanian elite towards the values of western civilization is easily observed (Boia 2002); the elite passionately adopts the western European cultural model, mostly French (Boia 2002, Djuvara 2013). The "active minority" attracts the whole society in the change of the frame of reference (Djuvara 2013). The process of acculturation, which began in eighteenth century, reveals the most rapid and spontaneous westernization in Eastern Europe at the beginning of the following century (Djuvara 2013). The wars against the Ottoman Empire, the peace treaties and diplomacy progressively boosted Russia's position in the principalities, starting with the end of the eighteenth century. Russia was a modernizing agent, along with the young generation of intellectuals educated in Western Europe (Vintilă-Ghițulescu 2013: 16).

Starting with the nineteenth century, there is a “Europe” concept in the Romanian thinking. Europe means the centre and west of the continent, an urban and industrial modern world, dynamic, highly civilized. Starting with the nineteenth century, we could speak of a (political, administrative, economic, social, cultural and intellectual) “Europeanization” of Romania (Hitchins 2014: 3):

No significant aspect of the public and private life of the elite and of those who aspired to join it was left untouched by “Europe” (Hitchins 2014: 76).

The exterior elements of the cultural model, linguistic and discursive acquisitions included, “define values and symbols, strongly modelling people’s life” (Boia 2002, our translation). In less than two generations, the Byzantine and oriental model is replaced by the western one; the western model brings two vital elements in the Romanian society: modernization and national ideology (Boia 2002).

Between the Russian protectorate and the outbreak of the 1848 Revolution, Romanian society was in a state of flux: Ottoman suzerainty versus the desire of independence; representative government versus Russian interference; Eastern tradition versus Western innovation. “Striking contrasts were everywhere manifest – in dress, language, and customs” (Hitchins 2014: 84). The shaping of modern Romania accelerated after the Revolution of 1848 (Hitchins 2014: 76): the union of the principalities is achieved in 1859; a Constitution is adopted in 1866 (the model of this Constitution is the Belgian Constitution of 1830); in May 1866 starts the rule of the foreign prince Carol.

The intellectuals who prepared the revolution, fought in the Revolution of 1848 and who finally saw their wishes come true, were “inspired by a single, all-encompassing goal: to raise the Romanian nation out of its backwardness and to bring it into communion with the modern world, which, to them, meant Western Europe” (Hitchins 2014: 88, emphasis added). The representatives of this generation of intellectuals were animated by the “spirit of the time”, a form of liberalism, which became known as Forty-Eightism (pașoptism) and its representatives as forty-eighters (pașoptiști). The generation of 1848 had first-hand acquaintance with Western Europe: the great majority of the representatives of this generation studied in French or German universities, for all of them Paris was “their spiritual second home” (Hitchins 2014: 92). Socially, they represented the upper and middle class, an elite strongly determined to change the Romanian society.

3. The analysis

The observations regarding the nineteenth century corpus will be compared with the results of our previous studies (Constantinescu 2013, forth.) based on the analysis of Romanian chronicles of the mid-seventeenth – early eighteenth centuries.

3. 1. Im/politeness lexicon

Within the context of the princely court, as revealed by the chroniclers, the key lexeme was cinste (< Sl. čistī), its’ most important meaning being ‘honour’, but also “consideration, politeness, esteem, respect” (DA). Cinste appeared in collocations with a primi, a petrece, a merge, a duce, a aduce (cu) (‘to receive’, ‘to accompany’, ‘to leave’, ‘to take someone’, ‘to bring someone (with)’). These forms were accompanied by lexemes indicating ritualised exterior behaviours: pompă, fală, alai (‘pomp’, ‘glory’, ‘suite’). Cinste has also a derivative, the verb a cinsti, with either an abstract meaning (‘to honour’) or a more concrete one (‘to offer food and drinks’); sometimes, in the text of the chronicle, it is difficult to make a distinction between these two meanings, as sometimes they seem to overlap.

In the mid-nineteenth century (due mainly to the massive Latin-Romance borrowings), the metacommunicative lexicon of politeness is more diverse: cinste is no longer a key lexeme, only the verb a cinsti is still used in this sphere. Instead, the nouns that appear quite frequently are: sevas (<Ngr. sévas) ‘respect’, respect (<Fr. respect, Lat. respectus) ‘respect’, politețe (<Fr. politesse) ‘politeness’, manieră, maniere (<Fr. manière) ‘manners’, amabilitate (<Fr. amabilité, Lat. amabilitas, -atis) ‘amiability’, familiaritate (<Fr. familiarité, Lat. familiaritas, -atis) ‘familiarity’, stimă (<It. stima, Fr. estime) ‘esteem’, tact (<Fr. tact, Germ. Takt) ‘tact’, grațiozitate (<Fr. gracieuseté, Lat. gratiositas, -atis, It. graziosità) ‘gracefulness’, bunătate (<bun ‘good’) ‘kindness’, galantomie (<galantom < cf. Fr. galant homme, It. galantuomo) ‘gallantry’, bun simț ‘common sense’. The adjectives (sometimes nominalized) are: políticos (<Ngr. politikós) ‘polite’, respectuos (< Fr. respectueux) ‘respectful’, amabil (< Fr. aimable, Lat. amabilis) ‘amiable’, afectuos (< Fr. affectueux, Lat. affectuosus) ‘affectionate’, franc (<Fr. franc) ‘frank’, civilizat/ă (cf. Fr. civilisé) ‘civilized’, galant (< Fr. galant, It. galante) ‘gallant’, cumsecade ‘decent, honest’, cordial/ă (< Fr. cordial, cf. It. cordiale) ‘cordial’, îndatoritor (< a se îndatori) ‘obliging’. Besides a cinsti (<Sl. cĭstiti) ‘to honour, to respect’, the verbs used are less varied: a respecta (<Fr. respecter) ‘to respect’, a stima (cf. Fr. estimer) ‘to esteem’, a onora (<Lat. honorare, Fr. honorer, It. onorare) ‘to honour’. The most frequent adverbs are politicos and respectuos.

As regards impoliteness, most of the examples from the chronicles are centred on cinste (in negative or ironical uses) and its derivative (necinste); an interesting class refers to the difference in social ranking (mojic, mojicie ‘boor, boorish/rudeness’) and makes reference to inappropriate behaviour. The corpus of the mid-nineteenth century also reveals a variety of terms, the disappearance of cinste as a key lexeme and the resistance of the terms associating the low social status with the lack of education (mojic, mojicie etc.) or improper education, with the lack of openness towards the new rules of social behaviour (a reproach especially addressed by women to men).

The nouns involved in the sphere of impoliteness are: obraznicie (< obraznic) ‘rudeness, insolence’, batjocură ‘ridicule, insult’; insultă (< Fr. insulte) ‘insulte’, insolență (< Fr. insolence, lat. insolentia) ‘insolence’, mojicie (<mojic< Rus. mužik, “low social class” and (as a result of this low ranking) “uneducated, uncivil”) ‘roughness, rudeness’, impertinență (< Fr. impertinence) ‘impertinence’, lack of something polite: sevas (<Ngr. sevas) ‘respect’; respect (<Fr. respect, Lat. respectus) ‘respect’; delicatețe (<Fr. délicatesse) ‘delicacy’. The adjectives (sometimes nominalized) frequently used are: obraznic (obraz-nic, obraz ‘cheek’) ‘insolent, rude’, mojic ‘boor’, modârlan ‘rude, boor’, nerușinat (<rușine ‘shame’) ‘shameless’, grosolan (< It. grossolano) ‘rough, rude, gross’, impertinent (< Fr. impertinent, lat. impertinens, -ntis) ‘impertinent’, fără (de) obraz (lit. ‘with no cheek’) ‘shameless’, bădăran (< Hung. badaró) ‘rude, rough, boor’. Again, the verbs are a smaller category: a se obraznici (refl.) ‘to become rude’, ‘to start behaving in a rude manner’, a insulta (< Fr. insulter, Lat. insultare) ‘to insult’, a batjocori ‘to ridicule, to insult’. As for the adverbs, obraznic ‘rudely’ is the most frequent.

The choice of words depends on the age of the character or the generation of the author; for instance, the older characters or authors older than most of 1848 generation use more terms of Greek origin: sevas, catigorie (<Ngr. katigoría) ‘slander’, catahrismie (<Ngr. katáhrisis) ‘abuse’. Lexical choice is not only an indicator of the character’s age, but also of an attachment to the older social norms.

In what follows, we shall present our observations regarding the metacommunicative aspects revealed by the characters’ and narrator’s interventions. It should be mentioned that there are similar evaluative lexemes both of verbal and nonverbal (an action, a gesture, etc.) behaviour, related both to the current interaction and to a more general frame (based on interactional history), both in praesentia or in absentia.

3. 2. Im/politeness appraisal and emotional implications

Im/politeness terms are connected with several affective terms, politeness leading to positive and impoliteness leading to negative emotions. Sometimes, affective terms designate a source of politeness – for example, gratitude could be a source of respect:

1. Mă închinai pătruns de recunoștință ... VA P, 578

I bowed full of gratitude...

2. Respectul lor pentru persoana împăratului Rusiei era izvorât din recunoștință, căci Rusia pusese capăt domniei fanarioților... VA P, 368

Their respect for the emperor of Russia came from gratitude, as Russia put an end to the Phanariot rule...

3. În acest palat era rezidența de vară a îmbunătățitei împărătese Mariei, al căria nume cu sevas și recunoștință se răspunde de cii sărimani și filantropi. GAs II, 339

In this palace there was the summer residence of the kind empress Maria, whose name is pronounced with respect and gratitude by the poor and by philanthropists.

Gratitude and respect are explicitly connected in examples 2 and 3, while in example 1 the gesture of bowing could be connected with respect, but only the affect is expressed.

In some contexts there is a direct connection between respect/esteem and affection, admiration, love, adoration (durative emotional states), while in some others a momentary state is evoked (pleasant):

4. Am petrecut două săptămâni vesele în capitala Besarabiei, unde am găsit cea mai bună primire și cea mai cordială ospetie. CN PT, 46

I spent two cheerful weeks in the capital of Bessarabia, where I found the best reception and the most cordial hospitality.

5. Conte [Cavour] mă primi cu o simplicitate afectuoasă, mă puse lângă dânsul pe canapea... VA P, 557

The count [Cavour] welcomed me with affectionate simplicity, inviting me to sit next to him on the sofa...

6. Societatea lui era plăcută, manierele lui afectuoase, convorbirea lui foarte

atrăgătoare... VA P, 457

His company was pleasant, his manners affectionate, his conversation very appealing...

7. ... nu era nimica sămănând a fudulie, a hauteur, în raporturile dintre boierul cel mare și omul lui de casă. Acesta era tratat cu o familiaritate binevoitoare, adesea chiar afectuoasă. RR, 66

... there was nothing like pride, like hauteur, in the relationship between the grand boyar and his protégé. The protégé was treated with benevolent, often even affectionate, familiarity.

8. prin manierele lor plăcute, mă siliră a mă crede în Valahia iarăși ca într-o țară civilizată. VA P, 190-191

...by their pleasant manners they determined me to consider myself again in Wallachia like in a civilized country.

9. Alexis o privi [pe verișoara lui călugăriță] cu o respectuoasă admirare și crezu că vede un palid serafim... VA P, 505

Alexis looked at her [his cousin, a nun] with respectful admiration and he thought he saw a pale seraphim...

10. ...părinții lui erau fericiți și mândri de dânsul, căci el le arăta o afecție respectuoasă... VA P, 496

... his parents were happy and proud of him, as he showed them a respectful affection...

11. Această bătrână păru încântată. Ea stima și iubea pe Elescu. B, 302

The old lady seemed delighted. She esteemed and loved Elescu.

12. Sfaturile pline de bunătate care îmi da și laudele ce îmi prodiga pentru propășirile ce făceam sub direcția lui, îmi însuflaseră atât respect și atâta iubire pentru el, încât ... VA P, 60

His kind pieces of advice and his praising of my artistic progress under his supervision inspired me with such a respect and love for him that...

13. – Te respect și te ador! zise Alexandru... B, 196

– I respect you and I adore you! said Alexandru...

The expression of emotion is not new in this context, it is quite similar to the findings regarding the seventeenth-early eighteenth centuries. There were affective terms: milă, dragoste, bucurie, blândețe ('charity', 'love', 'joy', and 'kindness'), indicating closeness between the participants; the affectivity was marked within an official hierarchy, when the political-social distance between the participants was small or the direction is from a superior towards an inferior. In the mid-nineteenth century corpus, the affect regards mainly a private relationship: between (future) family members (examples 9, 10, 11), lovers (example 13) or friends (4, 6); there is an affect implied by a public relationship based on socialization (example 8) or on tutoring (example 12). The only official, diplomatic situation where an affective term emerges is illustrated by example 5: the visit of diplomat Alecsandri to prime-minister Cavour. Example 7, marking positive affect in the close relationship between a social superior (the grand boyar) and his inferior (the protégé), reveals continuity in the Romanian mentality regarding the appropriate relation management. Besides the continuity of expressing positive emotions in interaction (in symmetrical or asymmetrical relationships), revealing a cultural trait of the Romanian society, one cannot disregard the importance of the Romantic literary ideology, predominant during the nineteenth century, ideology which emphasizes affectivity.

The locutor's behaviour triggers an affective response when it is appraised as inappropriate: the locutor could be upset, vexed, nervous, furious (transitory affective states) or he/she could express hatred towards the person negatively evaluated (durative affective state):

14. Marița: Bătrână! Ce ai zis bătrână? Pușchiule făr' de obraz!/ Mă duc, mă duc c-am să leșân și mă-nnăduș de necaz. PND, 363

Marița: Old! You called me old? You shameless kid! I'm leaving, I'm leaving as I'll faint and I'm so angry, I can't breathe.

15. Elena era supărată: „O asemenea cutezare - își zicea ea - este o insultă... Ce voi face? (...)” B, 194

Elena was upset: “Such an insolence – she said to herself – is an insult... What am I going to do?”

16. Elena scoase un țipet. „Iată încă un nebun! își zise ea după cea dintâi impresiune, dar astă dată este o impertinință, o insultă!” Ea se necăjise în adevăr... B, 193

Elena let out a cry. “Here's another madman! she said to herself after her first impression, but this time this is an impertinence, an insult!” She was vexed indeed.

17. ... acum uitase durerile ce-i cauzase insulta lui Alexandru. B, 215-216
... now she had forgotten the pains Alexandru's insult had caused her.

18. Dridri, la această grosolană aluzie, se roși pe obraz și observă cu glas indignat:... VA P, 417-418

Dridri, hearing this rude allusion, turned red and replied in an indignant voice: ...

19. Chirița (intrând furioasă și făcându-și vânt cu basmaua): ... VA T1, 399

Chirița (entering furious and fanning her handkerchief): ...

20. Tarsița [vorbind cu Lipicescu]: (...) Radu-i un impertinent ambițios, nesuferit... îl urăsc din toată inima... VA T2, 350

Tarsița [addressing Lipicescu]: (...) Radu is an ambitious impertinent, repugnant... I hate him with all my heart...

Besides the lexical affective items explicitly framing the emotional response, the emotion could be reconstructed (Plantin 2011) according to the exterior manifestations (turning red, suffocation, the tone of voice, etc.). In the chronicles, the emotional implication of the target or of a third party was marked by lexemes such as sadness and anger. The emotional lexicon appears to be rather constant, although there is a more evident scale of negative affect (upset, vexed, furious, hatred) in the modern texts, all illustrating a private setting: in praesentia of the recipient (example 14), sometimes in interior monologues (examples 15, 16); in the narratorial interventions (examples 17-19); in the absence of the recipient, the evaluation appears as a confession (example 20). Impoliteness events seem to provoke a negative emotion that could affect the response to the appraised inappropriate input.

3. 3. The politeness continuum

While the key lexeme cinste was used with terms conveying an exterior behaviour (pompă, fală, alai ‘pomp’, ‘glory’, ‘suite’) or with adjectives implying gradability (mare, foarte ‘great’, ‘very’), in the modern texts there are collocations with two apparently synonymous terms: stimă – respect, a stima – a respecta, a respecta – a cinsti:

21. Zoița: (...) Dar să știi că eu oi apăra pe serdarul Mândru, pe care îl respect și-l cinstesc, și niciodată nu voi lăsa să-l batjocorească cineva dinaintea mea! PND, 333

Zoița: (...) You should know that I shall defend boyar Mândru, whom I respect and honour, and I'll never allow anyone to insult him in front of me!

22. El începuse a stima și a respecta pe Elena... B, 201

He began to esteem and respect Elena...

23. Stan: D-ta trebuie să cinstești și să respecti pe bărbatul d-tale. PND, 317

Stan: You [pol. pron.] must honour and respect your [pol. pron.] husband.

In fact, there seems to be a scale, increasing the degree of reverence from stimă to respect or from a stima to a respecta and further to a cinsti/a onora; at the same time, there is a difference in the interior/exterior manifestation of the participants as regards the recipient (s), the lower degree of reverence is connected with the internal attitude, while the higher degree of reverence is connected with both internal attitude and exteriorization. The verb a cinsti does not appear alone (in contrast with the situation in the seventeenth-early eighteenth century chronicles), but collocating with other verbs involved in the scale of deference – one could hypothesize that the meaning ‘to honour’ was less prominent for lay persons; the more concrete meaning could have been more prominent in the mid-nineteenth century than the abstract one, the collocations with apparent synonyms reinforcing accordingly the abstract interpretation of the verb.

The behaviours that are positively evaluated could be distinguished by some quite subtle traits (Watts's 2003 distinction between politic and polite behaviour could be useful). Politețe (politeness) seems to be connected with distance (in a deferential sense, what Brown and Levinson would label negative politeness) in Bolinteanu's novels:

24. Aceste dame îl întâmpină cu o politeță la care el nu se aștepta. Venirea lui făcu mai multă impresiune asupra postelnicului George, care, îndată ce-l văzu, îl luă în brațe și îi zise: B, 179

The ladies greeted him with an unexpected politeness. His arrival made a more powerful impression on boyar George who, as soon as he saw him, embraced him and said:...

25. Ea nici nu-l întrebă unde a fost, răceala ei umplu inima lui de bănuieli... Salută cu politeță și trecu înainte. B, 188

She didn't even ask where he had been, her coldness filled his heart with suspicion... he greeted politely [lit. with politeness] and moved forward.

The above presented situations reveal the evaluation from the perspective of the male character. He (the guest) is surprised by the way he is greeted by persons he used to have a close relation with (the ladies), while the male host expresses joy in receiving him (the boyar's gesture of embracing him could express a positive affect). The contrast in the feminine/masculine characters' reaction could suggest that 'politeness' is linked to a cold-deferent kind of attitude. This idea could be supported by the second example, where an explicit cold attitude of the feminine character triggers a polite salute (that again could imply a lack of emotion, thus a cold-deferent attitude). Politeness appears as a positively (but cold) marked behaviour.

It seems that familiaritate (familiarity) represents closeness (positive politeness in Brown and Levinson's framework):

26. Elena chemă pe Caterina și îi prezintă pe Elescu. Cea din urmă răspunde la prezentare cu o familiaritate franșă. — Îți place mult politica? îi zise ea. B, 131

Elena called Caterina and introduced Elescu to her. Caterina responded with a frank familiarity. — Are you [sg.] found of politics? she asked him.

Familiarity is another type of positively marked behaviour (cf. Sifianou 1992). Tact, maniere, bun simț, respect (tact, manners and common sense) seem to convey the adequacy frame of behaviour (i.e., politic behaviour), but their connection with affective terms (see supra) determines a shift towards a positively marked behaviour (i.e., polite). Within the realm of positively marked behaviour, one can notice a difference between a "cold-deferent" behaviour (politețe) and the other terms connected with positive affects ("warm" behaviour).

In Alecsandri's memoirs of his diplomatic activity there are some terms reflecting a positively appraised behaviour of a superior; the evaluation (grațiozitate 'gracefulness', bunătate 'kindness') is made by the inferior. The narrator assumes his status inferiority and, as a recipient, he positively evaluates the attitude of his superior:

27. Lordul Malmersbury avu bunătatea a răspunde că (...) Englitera le va conserva [românilor] stima ce merită oamenii practici... VA P, 587

Lord Malmersbury had the kindness to answer that England would show them [Romanians] the esteem deserved by practical people...

28. Mă închinai respectuos și ieșii din cabinetul împărațesc, încântat și transportat de grațiozitatea cu care Maiestatea Sa mă tratase timp de o oră. VA P, 572

I bowed respectfully and went out of the imperial study, delighted and transported by the gracefulness His Majesty showed me for an hour.

29. – Vă mulțămesc, Mylord, în numele compatrioților mei, răspunsei închinându-mă, și adaug mulțămirile mele personale pentru bunătatea cu care m-ați ascultat și mai cu samă pentru grațiozitatea cu care ați dat chiar acum titlul de Prinț colonelului Cuza. VA P, 589-590

– Thank you [pl.], my lord, on behalf of my compatriots, I replied bowing to him, and I add my personal thanks for your kindness of listening to me and especially for your [pl.] gracefulness of calling colonel Cuza a Prince.

One can hypothesize that a person with an inferior status does not expect a deferent behaviour towards him/her from a superior; thus, when an inferior is treated as an equal by his superior, the type of behaviour is unexpected, being construed as an extra positive mark. The situation could reveal, in the recipient's interpretation, the implications of a Romanian cultural characteristic, with a high distance to power (according to Hofstede's system) in the calculus of what could be appropriate behaviour when an inferior is the recipient.

3. 4. Im/politeness and the self

Even if most of the examples seem to illustrate a focus on the individual self, there are some examples showing a connection with the collective and relational selves:

30. Galantescu: Foarte adevărat, domnul meu, și te rog a fi gata a-mi da blagoslovenia în loc de tată, căci pe dumneata te respectez mai mult decât pe oricare altul. PND, 124

Galantescu: Very true, dear sir [lit. my sir], and please be ready to give me a fatherly blessing, because I respect you [pol. pron.] more than anyone else.

31. Cine (...) nu s-au încredințat de respectul tinerilor către bătrâni? VA P, 109/ respectul tinerilor pentru bătrâni VA P, 139

Who is not convinced of the young people's srespect towards the elders? / the young people's srespect of the elders

As regards the intricate connection between relational and collective selves, example 30 (similar to example 2, supra) suggests that the "respect" evaluation applies to a generation or even a people, conveying the importance of different relationships (child-parent, descendent-ancestor and beneficiary–benefactor) of the speaker with the recipient at the same time.

A highly ranked character could be very sensitive to the lack of expected behaviour, to the ignoring of his higher status or, as a third party, to the ignoring of higher status by an inferior:

32. Neamuș (încet, către Vulpe): Văzut-ai așa obrăznicie! Radu n-au sărutat mâna vărului Iorgu.

Trufandachi: Lipsa de sevas. VA T2, 292

Neamuș (lower voice, to Vulpe): Have you seen such rudeness! Radu did not kiss cousin Iorgu's hand.

Trufandachi: Lack of respect.

The example reveals diverging frames of reference between the old/modern way of social interaction: not kissing a (perceived by others) superior's hand infringes the old sociability rights (to which the characters adhere), but maps the new sociability rights (of Radu, a young man educated in France). The example accounts for the diachronic relativity of 'politeness' (Kádár & Haugh 2013). There is a clash in the reference frames of the old and new generations and a sign of a transition from a strictly hierarchical society to a looser hierarchy within a more democratic setting. In the chronicles, only the relational and collective selves of the target were affected by impoliteness in formal settings, an important role was assigned to status recognition (by birth or political). It seems that status recognition is still important in mid-nineteenth century, especially when the character appraising the behaviour of another interactant belongs to the upper classes.

3. 5. Im/politeness and intentionality

Politeness appears as a desideratum; according to the characters' or narrator's interventions, politeness should be targeted (deontic stance) at parents, social superiors, and husbands (both in private and public settings):

33. Evghenidis: Ești în prezența Sfatului, domnule, în prezența miniștrilor, și trebuie să răspunzi cu respect. VA T2, 341

Evghenidis: You are [sg.] in the presence of the government, sir, in the presence of ministers, and you [sg.] need to answer respectfully [lit. with respect].

34. Să fim drepți și să ne închinăm cu respect și recunoștință dinaintea memoriei părinților. Ei prin traiul lor păreau a face parte din secolul XVI, dar au avut meritul sublim de a introduce în Patria lor un secol de progres și de regenerare, secolul XIX, adus din străinătate prin copiii lor. VA P, 368

Let's be right and bow with respect and gratitude to the memory of our parents. By their way of living, they seemed part of the sixteenth century, but they had the sublime merit of introducing in their country a century of progress and renewal, the nineteenth century, brought by their children from abroad.

35. Anastase: (...) Arghirișo dragă, Ț-am zis să nu-î răspunzi, ea Ți-este mumă, dacă mi-e mie nevastă, trebuie s-o respectezi, fata mea (...) PND, 188

Anastase: (...) Dear Arghirișă, I told you not to answer back, she is your mother since she's my wife, you have to respect her, my daughter...

Politeness is invoked as a norm when the lack of appropriate behaviour is compensated by action– the character challenges the interlocutor who called him “rude” to a duel:

36. Nicu: Pentru că voiesc să-ți dau o lecție de politeță. VA T2, 269

Nicu: Because I want to teach you a politeness lesson.

Although it is not always evident that there is an offending intention, the uptake indicates that there is a perceived/attributed intention (maybe with one/two exception (s), when the interlocutor laughs while negatively evaluating the locutor). The impolite intervention could be a reaction to a previous remark perceived as offensive:

37. - Cel puțin eu îți mărturisesc, cucoana mea, zise acest domn ofensat, că nici eu nu am văzut pe vreo damă puind o grădină cu flori pe cap, ca dumneata. Mă iartă, dar parcă ești o bre...

- Ah! ce obraznicie! strigă doamna Bîlcioaia făcându-se că leșină. PRR, 232

- At least I confess, my lady, said the offended gentleman, that I have never seen a lady putting a garden of flowers on top of her head like you [pol. pron.] did. Forgive-me, but you seem to be...

- Ah! Such rudeness! cried madam Bîlcioaia while pretending to faint.

The lady criticized the way the gentleman was dressed: this event, perceived as negative (see the adjective ofensat ‘offended’ in the narratorial intervention), leads to a critique of the way the lady arranged her hat, and this intervention triggers the explicit negative appraisal.

Regarding intentionality in the chronicles, similar to the findings in the modern corpus, most of the examples reveal an uptake of the verbal and nonverbal behaviour as offensive and intentional. The “aggressor” is sometimes unaware of the effect of his/her behaviour, while in other situations there is an intention to offend and an associated uptake (Constantinescu ms.).

The following examples reflect a negatively evaluated behaviour but without a negative effect (maybe without a real uptake):

38. Marghiolița (dinîntu): Fugi, obraznicule, că m-ai spăriet [o speriasă sărutându-i umărul] (...) Ha, ha, ha ! cât îi de obraznic! VA T1, 297

Marghiolița (from her room): Go away, you rude, you have frightened me [he surprised her by kissing her shoulder] (...) Ha, ha, ha! he is so rude!

39. – Ești un impertinent! zise principesa râzând; dar îți iert pentru că ai fost profet... S-a dus la băi... B, 206

- You are an impertinent! said the princess laughing; but I forgive you since you've guessed [lit. you've been a prophet]... he went to the baths.

As most of the examples are from plays, there is a less evident author's control. Nevertheless, the playwright's intervention is present, indicating the way the readers should interpret a line:

40. Arbore: Dacă mă știi, ce mă mai întrebi de nume?... Ai prins orbul găinilor?

Lipicescu (obraznic): Ei!... ș-apoi?... VA T2, 287

Arbore: If you know me, why do you keep asking for my name?... Have you become blind?

Lipicescu (rude): Well, so what?...

41. Stâlpeanu: (...) (întorcându-se către Lipicescu) Cât pentru tine, ciocoiule, acu să ieși din casa vărului Iorgu și să nu te mai arăți pe-aici... ieși!

Lipicescu (obraznic): Nu priimesc poronci de la dumneata. VA T2, 356-357

Stâlpeanu: (...) (turning to Lipicescu) As for you, upstart, get out of cousin Iorgu's house right now and don't you ever come again... get out!

Lipicescu (rude): I'm not taking orders from you [pol. pron.].

4. Concluding remarks

In our corpus, the comments on polite behaviour are more frequent in the narratorial sphere than in the characters' domain. Maybe polite behaviour is not as salient as impolite behaviour, or its adequacy does not trigger an explicit appraisal. Nevertheless, it is interesting to see that there are situations when the speaker evaluates his/her own behaviour as complying with the norms or expectations (self-monitoring, examples 12, 13, 21, 31).

For the Romanian society of the mid-nineteenth century Hofstede's parameters would be: collectivism, high distance to power, and lower distance in the social relationship. The collectivism parameter is connected to the closeness and affectivity between participants in interaction; politeness is not only face-enhancing, but also face-constituting (it is a part of identity construction), even though less salient than impoliteness (there are more politeness evaluations in the narratorial discourse).

In the formal setting of the feudal court, it was (quasi) obligatory to show deference or closeness through exterior manifestations, as politeness was a ritualised behaviour; the ritualised behaviour was doubled by stereotypical lexical means of appraisal. The mid-nineteenth century reveals a wide variety of private and public relationships, as well as the importance of socialization; the exterior manifestations are a norm in certain settings (for example, diplomacy) and the calculus of appropriateness differs from one frame of reference (the old) to another (the modern). The politeness lexicon is rich and seems to distinguish between different types of appropriate and positively marked behaviour. Many instances of metapragmatic comments arise as a result of the very salient awareness of a brutal change of the reference frame in a given context.
