

BOUNDARIES OF ACCEPTABILITY OR A APLICA PENTRU O SLUJBĂ (APPLYING FOR A JOB)

ABSTRACT

The aim of the current paper is to approach some Romanian words which make possible a discussion about nuances. A particular phrase (applying for a job) has attracted our attention due to the fact it is frequently used in oral discourses and also in different forms of the written media, but it is not listed in the Romanian dictionaries. If the noun job could be considered adapted, there being no hesitation regarding its association with one gender class or in indicating a plural form and the verb to apply could be adopted with the English meaning, in the case of registering a new synonym for the word place (Rom. loc) the label would be possible acceptance.

Key words: shades, adaptation, adoption, acceptance, linguistic inquisitiveness

The current article begins with a query: does the linguist, in his intercession to inspect the language and its governing principles of construction and evolution, abide by all conventionalisms? Is the linguist a partisan of convenient perceptions, of depersonalized adherences to clichés institutionalized by tradition? Is the linguist a relentless person who only practices correction, an unyielding barrier standing against innovation? Isn't he, the linguist, constantly engaged in contending at a feverish pace against wilted patterns? With the wariness needed to inscribe outside lavishness, we daresay that a linguist does not always let himself ensnared by statements, that, in his attempt to disseminate the particles of the traditional mental frame, he does not let himself intimidated by the existence of a plan of mathematical tight-fitting inferences. There are linguists who upbraid the actual being of a flaunty and hubristic wall of the aggressive and exclusivist individual¹, who plead for desisting from some of the linguistic prejudices², who blame the insertion in linguistic units of expressions that contradict the logic of the message, or alter the evoked reality³, who fervently criticize equating between deviation (a variation that deviates from the standard or norm⁴) and *error*⁵ (a wrong action attributable to bad judgment⁶) and who invest the term deviation as a prominent factor in the evolution of a language⁷. The compelling status of the norm does not incriminate in whatsoever context deviation and does not suppress all attempts of instating deviation as a primary source in shaping the various segments of the language. Explaining the term deviation abstracts away from past essays to regard the language as a constant, immutable phenomena. Linguistic studies which have appeared after the influence exerted by the purist ideas had changed magnitude, resent this strict and highly prescriptive approach⁸. The Romanian Literary language is not immutable and evolves greatly by accepting some of the deviations⁹.

Moreover, the existence of controversial issues in Romanian Linguistics¹⁰ sustains that language study is the result of what is known as linguistic inquisitiveness¹¹ and not of reformulating inferences unverified by the researcher himself.

Having in view these issues, could language documentation and description be labeled as a clear-cut framed system or rather as an assemblage in which innovation – term deprived of any derogatory hue – arouses a debate upon nuances, boundaries that can be transgressed, intellectual intuition? If there is possible to operate a distinction between innovation and mistake, if there is belief in the wary comprehensive attitude of the linguist, sciential of the entire language system¹², if the bondage to intransigent purism¹³ is a highly debatable topic, could there be talked about customary, weakened formulas, about absurd and futile rules? The answer is predictable if we perceive the phenomena of accepting some words of foreign origin as being a component of an open system, in perpetual and intense evolution. The dynamic character¹⁴ of the language is given by deviations, innovations which avert and contradict linguistic organization existent at a certain point¹⁵.

However, if we admit the fact that the language has to change, this does not mean that we accept all changes without exception. We consider that giving a discourse an ostentatious neological character or bestowing some words with the titles of omnipresent and omnipotent, for example: vis cool (cool dream), ceașcă/cană cool, (cool cup), tunsoare cool (cool haircut), persoană cool (cool person), fonturi¹⁶ cool¹⁷ (cool font, etc.) is a mere proof of artificial “originality”. An argument in the favor of the permissive¹⁸ character of the linguistic norm is the plurality of answers to the question: Which terms do we accept, which terms do we adopt and which terms do we adapt? The answer lies in accepting or resenting terms such as possible, tolerant, accepted, official.

As follows, we will focus on the words: a aplica, job, locație (to apply, job, location), in an attempt to demonstrate that the Romanian language is dynamic and subject to change, which implies a great mobility of the vocabulary¹⁹. Introducing new vocabulary items and developing new meanings are factors of paramount importance which contribute to the perpetual renewal of the vocabulary²⁰.

The approach upon the above mentioned words was based on consulting prominent Romanian dictionaries as these represent a source of linguistic analyses regarding meaning, the usage of words, their interpretations from the perspective of varied speakers and in varied communicational backgrounds²¹, but also on the comparison of some contexts in which the lexical units we have made reference at had been actualized.

Job is the one of the words which drew our attention due to its frequent use in oral discourses, but also in written communication: Joburi în cazinouri și hoteluri din Nevada și California (“Jobs in casinos and hotels from Nevada and California”)²²; Un job în care nu sunt admise greșelile

(“The job in which mistakes are not forgiven”)²³; Mulți vizitatori au plecat resemnați de la târgul de joburi (“Many visitors left resigned from the job fair”)²⁴; Studii sociologice arată că peste jumătate din români își schimbă jobul mai des, cel puțin o dată la trei ani (“Sociological studies show that over half of the Romanians change their job more often, at least once every three years”)²⁵. This word is not a *lexical novelty*²⁶, fact proven by his recording in a lexicographic study from 1978²⁷, where, apart from the definition, synonyms are given: Rom. slujbă “employment”, Rom. serviciu “occupation”. This word is in the present-day Romanian in free variation with these synonyms²⁸, fact that is certified by the possibility of using them in the contexts exemplified above.

Including among its synonyms the word business (Rom. *afacere*²⁹) is materialized in current conversation by the tendency to add to the already existent meaning the characteristic: profitable. As a result, job, synonym with business (meaning an activity with a favorable result³⁰) is sometimes used for designating a lucrative employment. Phrases such as: *a most wanted job*³¹, *a successful job*³² are frequently used. The word job is, in our opinion, a necessary borrowing, being integrated among lexical units which, in spite of having an equivalent in Romanian, have certain advantages in comparison to the Romanian term (breviloquence, precision, expressivity, international use, etc.)³³. If this was only a term “in trend”, used out of unjustified display of some foreign elements, it would have passed in the category of Barbarisms (unadapted lexical borrowings and, after a while, abandoned³⁴). Although job is integrated in the class of *Anglicisms*³⁵, recent borrowings from British English and American English, *not adapted or not fully adapted*³⁶, the plural form being *joburi*³⁷ entitles us to consider it adapted to Romanian language system, as the formal changes are concerned, as it follows the same inflection pattern as Romanian neuters: (for example: jug, pl. juguri – Latin word³⁸). Furthermore, the enclitic Article is attached without hyphen, the borrowing finishing in a letter of the Romanian alphabet, pronounced exactly like in Romanian: *jobul*³⁹. This contributes to solving the dilemma related to the status of this word in Romanian. Therefore there are not uncertainties regarding its grammatical gender, its plural or its articulated forms.

The word a aplica (to apply) caught our attention due to its usage in the expression a aplica pentru un job/o bursă/o perioadă de probă (to apply for a job/for a scholarship/for a probation): Mai mult de 300 de studenți din toată țara pot aplica pentru o perioadă de probă în timpul verii (“More than 300 de students from all over the country can apply for a probation in the summertime.”)⁴⁰; Pentru a putea aplica pentru slujbă, candidații trebuie să aibă studii universitare (“In order to apply for the job, candidates need to have University Degrees.”)⁴¹; Era deja asistent universitar când a aplicat pentru o bursă de doctorat (“He was already a University Assistant when he applied for a doctorate scholarship.”)⁴²; Pentru a aplica pentru un job în acest domeniu, trebuie să ai scrisori de recomandare (“In order to apply for a job in this domain you must have letters of recommendation.”)⁴³; Poți să aplici pentru o bursă de doctorat în Istoria medicinei până la 14 aprilie (“You can apply for a doctorate scholarship in the History of Medicine until 14 April”).⁴⁴ The verb a aplica (“to apply”) is not registered with this meaning in the Romanian Dictionaries⁴⁵, even though the usage confirms its presence in the semantical sphere of the verbs to ask, to submit, to subscribe (Rom. a se înscrie). If we adopt this meaning, the verb to apply enriches its semantic area and changes its morphological status (it *also*⁴⁶ becomes intransitive). Thus, in the context I have applied for a scholarship abroad., the verb loses its possibility of receiving a Direct Object, the noun situated on the second position in the verbal phrase having the syntactical function of a Prepositional Object⁴⁷. The word to apply comes from Fr. appliquer, Lat. *applicare*⁴⁸, reality which does not contradict the opinion that the meaning to subscribe comes from English, where the verb to apply also means “submit a request”⁴⁹, apart from “put to practical use” (meaning which can be found for the Romanian verb *a aplica*⁵⁰). Besides, the phenomenon that words acquire new meanings is well-known. A relevant example would be Rom. cârțiță (Engl. mole), a loan from Bg. kărtica, Scr. *krtica*⁵¹, which borrowed the meaning “spy” from Engl. *mole*⁵².

If the noun job could be considered adapted, there being no hesitation regarding its association with one gender class or in indicating a plural form and the verb to apply could be adopted with the English meaning, in the case of registering a new synonym for the word place (Rom. loc) the label would be possible acceptance. The word location (Rom. locație) – as a contextual alternative for place retained our attention by its spontaneous usage: Locația nu a fost aleasă la întâmplare, factorii geoclimatici au fost luați în calcul (“The location was not chosen at random, the geoclimatic factor was taken into consideration”)⁵³; Poți mânca bine și destul de ieftin, dacă iei în calcul locația și serviciul fără cusur (“You can eat well and quite cheap if you have in view the location and the faultless service”)⁵⁴; Experiența va fi unică, cu un nou program și o nouă locație pentru petrecerile în aer liber – terasa Coca-Cola (“There will be a unique experience with a new schedule and a new location for the open-air parties – The Coca-Cola terrace”)⁵⁵; Dezvoltarea zonei turistice situate pe malul Lacului Bâlea și în jurul locației aflate la granița dintre județele Argeș și Sibiu le-a determinat pe oficialitățile județului să încerce să creeze... (“The development of the touristic area situated on the shore of Bâlea Lake and surrounding the location found at the boundary between the counties Argeș and Sibiu, had determined the county’s officials to try to create...”)⁵⁶. By analyzing the above examples, we can conclude that *location*⁵⁷, registered as a juridical term⁵⁸ is currently used in unspecialized speech, becoming a synonym for place. The expansion of word usage beyond a strictly specialized domain is a generally admitted theoretical issue and an easily detectable aspect in every-day speech⁵⁹. Nevertheless, a delimitation between the two registers must be made, for not encouraging the chaotic migration from one segment to another. In this case, we cannot talk about the development of a figurative meaning of a Romanian term, location, but rather about accepting a homonym for a term already present in the Romanian dictionaries, due to the semantic divergence.

We reckon that the examples are relevant to prove the semantic transfer from English towards Romanian.

In conclusion, we consider it safe to state that borrowings are of paramount importance as they are in accordance with the extralinguistic reality, but we are refractory in accepting terms whose presence in the realm of language is justified exclusively due to usage. We have to be selective, operating with semantic nuances: to adapt – to adopt – to accept.
