

BULGARIAN AND OLD SLAVIC LEXICAL ELEMENTS IN THE 19TH CENTURY
LITERARY ROMANIAN (THE BANAT LITERARY DIALECT) TO NICOLAE STOICA DE
HATEG, CHRONICLE OF BANAT

Abstract: The present day, Romanian literary language has had a natural historical course, unifying the regional literary variants along the sixteenth and twentieth centuries, corresponding to the historical provinces of the current geographic space of Romania, well represented in this respect: Muntenia, Moldova, Transylvania, Banat, Maramures, Oltenia. The process of unification of these literary variants was particularly intense, especially in the nineteenth century. Our interest in this article is directed to the regional terms of the dialect in Banat, found in written texts, of Bulgarian origin and old Slavic. We used as a method the content analysis, passing the Banat Chronicle, written over several years and finalized in 1825-1827, by Nicolae Stoica de Hateg.

Keywords: Romanian literary language; literary version of Banat (18th-19th centuries); lexical elements of Bulgarian origin; lexical elements of old Slavic origin in Nicolae Stoica de Hateg, Chronicle of Banat

From the specific terms of the Romanian region Banat, area found in the written texts, the present day Romanian literary language has kept very few, but they remain preserved in the present local language. The persistence in the current Banat subdialect of many words mentioned in the texts of the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries shows the close dependence of the regional literary variant on speech. The unique literary norm has been detached by regionalisms, in favor of the terms with a greater spread or those promoted by the great writers of the 19th-20th centuries. In old literary Romanian, however, spoken words were an essential source for the means of communication in writing; the territorial literary dialects are impregnated with the phonetic, morphological, lexical features of the speech corresponding to their area of manifestation.

The regional speech spontaneously and naturally penetrated into the written language, manifesting its influence in all its compartments. The linguist Gheorghe Bulgăr argues for this inevitable intromission of subdialects in the language that the persons involved in the production of written documents often belonged to the popular environment¹. Dominant are the lexical elements naturally entered into the Romanian language due to the cultural interferences of the ethnic groups living in Banat over time, among them the Bulgarians, even if not very numerous, compared to the Germans or Serbo-Croats, for example. The Bulgarian communities are currently well established in the Banat region. Their religion is Roman Catholic and settled here

The specific rules that allow us to talk about territorial literary variants come, in particular, from two directions: regional speech and languages from whom the borrowing in an area was made. The origins of the words from the Banat subdialect taken, from Stoica de Haţeg texts refer to the following sources: Latin, substrate elements, old Slavic, Serbo-Croatian, Bulgarian, Turkish, Hungarian, German, Neo-Greek, Ukrainian, Russian, Polish, French, Italian as well as words formed on Romanian land (by derivation and composition). From the statistical point of view, the terms extracted and analyzed by us from the work of the chronicler Nicolae Stoica de Haţeg, Chronicle of Banat, of Bulgarian origin, respectively old Slavic, fall in 2%, respectively 1.5% and 8.5%, respectively.
