

THE ROLE OF WORD-FORMATION EXERCISES IN TEACHING ENGLISH THROUGH TRANSLATION

Abstract: The purpose of this study is to investigate how translation activities which focus on word formation can help to develop students' creativity, but also their vocabulary, grammar and communication skills. I will examine the tests that the students took in class and based on their results I will draw a conclusion which either provides evidence in support of the effectiveness of such activities in translation classes or disagrees with this hypothesis.

Keywords: translation, word formation, test, evidence, education

The main reason of my decision to focus on word formation in teaching English is that such exercises seem to be difficult for my students and also because they are often required for the tests that most students want to sit in order to obtain a language certificate. Therefore, during some lessons we solved many exercises on this topic; the exercises and tests examined in my article are only a few of the many that we studied, but I selected them because they were the most familiar to the students and my aim was to help them realise that this topic is actually not such a complicated one.

I decided to focus on word formation for a period of time because such exercises seemed to be difficult for my students in the 9th grade and also because they are often required for the tests that most students want to sit in order to obtain a language certificate. Therefore, during some lessons we solved many exercises on this topic; the following words are only a few among the many that we studied, but I selected them because they were the most familiar to the students and my aim was to help them realise that this topic is actually not such a complicated one.

CERTAIN: certainty, certainly, uncertainty,

SIGHT: near-sighted, far-sighted, sighting, sightless, sighted, sightseeing,

COLLECT: collector, collection, collective,

FAMILY: familiar, familiarize, familial

FRIEND: friendless, friendly, friendship, unfriendly

At the beginning the students found this type of exercises quite complicated, but they worked with dictionaries, solved many exercises, asked for further explanations, worked in pairs and groups and when they felt confident to use the newly acquired words independently, I gave them the following worksheet with the aim of testing their knowledge.

The class in which the following test was given includes 31 students and all of them took the test. Of the total of 31 students, 18 got very good marks, between 9 and 10 (58%), 8 got marks between 6 and 8 (26%) and 5 students got marks of 4 and 5 (16%).

Note: each sentence is marked 0.5 points. Starting score: 1 point.

This worksheet belongs to one of the students who obtained a very good result; there are also other, less satisfying results, but after explaining all the mistakes, solving additional exercises, comparing different translation options in groups, even the less good results were definitely improved. And the fact that, in the end, the students know precisely under which circumstances and in which contexts they should use certain words is the most gainful activity.

Conclusion

In my endeavour of teaching my students the importance of word formation, I made use of many types of exercises revealing how morphemes can be used in order to connect words to other words and thus produce new words.

After finding solutions to so many tasks related to word formation, my students have realised on their own the fact that word formation highlights the significance of a language because a word can be transformed into a new one with the help of prefixes or suffixes and its meaning changes completely: frost-defrost, lucky-unlucky, discover-discovery, reason-reasonable; we can form nouns from verbs: depend-dependence, improve-improvement; nouns from adjectives: private-privacy, safe-safety; adjectives from nouns: harm-harmful, brilliance-brilliant; adjectives from verbs: consider-considerate, respond-responsible; verbs from adjectives: tight-tighten, legal-legalise; verbs from nouns: strength-strengthen.

Another important aspect of this type of assignments is that my students do not consider word formation such a complicated task anymore, but they rather think of it as a challenging one in which they have the chance to prove their mastery at finding solutions and creating new words independently.
