Abstract

The complex nature of color nuances manifested as interactive resultant between the light source, the colored object and the human brain reasonably constitutes an extremely interesting interdisciplinary subject. On the basis of common physiological parameters, appreciable psychospiritual specificities, but also divergent cultural features of their receivers at the linguistic level, the color terms are approached through symbolic naming and conventional codes. The wide range of color names is justified accordingly: the element in question reflects the essential conflation of subjective decoding and metaphorical connection of the visual stimuli. At the same time the polymorphism of semantic representations that are associated with the color vocabulary embodies the sensor order of society, the historical experiences and the fundamental idiosyncratic principles. Within the theoretical framework of contrastive linguistics this paper aims to analyze idioms involving two dominant neutral colors, white and black, since it is based on characteristic examples of colloquial Greek and three modern Slavic languages: Polish, Russian and Serbian.

Drawing upon reliable material excerpted from monolingual and bilingual, general, etymological and phraseological dictionaries we present the semantic approach to their reasonably existing interlingual anisomorphism as arises from autonomous idioms and from combinatorial structures. So on the one hand the intended highlighting of their semantic similarities and differences is achieved, while on the other hand we emphasize the catalytic role of national stereotypes in constructive reception of extralinguistic reality.

Résumé

La nature complexe des nuances de couleur qui se manifestent comme résultante interactive entre la source de lumière, l'objet coloré et le cerveau humain constitue raisonnablement un sujet interdisciplinaire extrêmement intéressant. En base des paramètres physiologiques habituels, des particularités psycho-spirituelles qui peuvent être évaluées, mais aussi des caractéristiques culturelles divergentes des récepteurs au niveau linguistique, les termes désignant des couleurs sont approchés par les noms symboliques et les codes conventionnels. La large gamme de noms de couleurs est par conséquent justifiée: l'élément en cause reflète la fusion essentielle de la décodification subjective et de la connexion métaphorique des stimuli visuels. En même temps, le polymorphisme des représentations sémantiques qui sont associées au lexique des couleurs incarne l'ordre sensoriel de la société, les expériences historiques et les principes fondamentaux idiosyncratiques. Dans le contexte théorique de la linguistique contrastive, le travail vise l'analyse des idiomes qui impliquent deux couleurs dominantes neutres, blanc et noir, vu qu'il se fonde sur des exemples spécifiques à la langue grecque colloquiale et aux trois langues slaves modernes: le polonais, le russe et le serbe.

En base des matériaux fiables extraits des dictionnaires monolingues et bilingues, généraux, étymologiques et phraséologiques, on présente l'approche sémantique de l'anisomorphisme interlinguistique, tel que résultat des idiomes autonomes et des structures combinatoires. Donc, on veut, d'une part, mettre en évidence les similitudes et les différences sémantiques et, d'autre part, accentuer le rôle catalyseur des stéréotypes nationaux dans la réception constructive de la réalité extralinguistique.

1. Introductory remarks

In each time period and social structure colors play a remarkable role in the vivid depiction of universal reality. With their polyhedral semantic structural elements they reflect the emotional fluctuations and the spiritual manifestations of speakers. Indeed this ascertainment is true in spite of the impressively disparate cultural specificities of every nation, since the linguistic homogeneity of colors functions as a common denominator and additionally the colors “everywhere and always continue to be strongholds of symbolic thought”¹.

Since the interpretation of the language expressions serves as “a reflection of the vision and perception of the world”², we become aware of the fact that the symbolism of colors exerts a catalytic influence on the formation of the phraseology wealth in each language. Besides, in this way in the considered language codes (Greek, Polish, Russian, Serbian) we should observe the high frequency and exceptional polymorphy of such phrasemes which constitute the main subject of this paper.

Modern dictionaries, descriptive and phraseological, monolingual and bilingual ones are used as the primary bibliographic database. The selection of the most illustrative cases is made according to semantic criteria and aims at the presentation of the basic similarities and the most interesting deviancies. Therefore this attempt can't be identified with a complete four language review of lexical phrases.

2. Comparative analysis of phraseologisms

By the method of contrastive examination we approach the text corpus that includes a total of 310 lexical units, namely 65 Greek; 76 Polish; 67 Russian; 102 Serbian.

Owing to an easier attentive reading we have distinguished all the idioms on the basis of their positive or negative semantic framework, while we accompany them with the necessary explanatory indications: G ⇔ Greek; P ⇔ Polish; R ⇔ Russian; S ⇔ Serbian; C ⇔ connotation; = literal translation; ~ meaning.

2.5. The colors white and black in phraseologisms

The two colors which are achromatic in the human perception often coexist in phrasemes, in spite of their function as characteristic carriers of intense contrast (white is mainly equated with the positive good, while black is the principal identification of the negative evil):

¹⁶ Nowakowska, 2010, p. 123.

¹⁷ "The phraseologism reminds the gesture with the nail of the thumb at which we touch the inside of the nail of the thumb, when we clean the dirt under this fingernail" (Pintarić, 2007, p. 180).

R₂: называть белое чёрным (чёрное белым) = call the white black (the black white) ~ present in a biased way

S: прогласити црно за бело = declare the black for white ~ distort the meaning

C: speak or act in an evasive way, bend the truth

3. Conclusions

The conducted contrastive analysis of phraseologisms containing the colors white and black in Modern Greek and three Slavic languages (Polish, Russian, Serbian) reveals an admirable identity in their conceptual manifestations.

In this way it is emphatically justified that “in the human consciousness the black color is burdened with negative connotation”¹⁸, seeing that, with its symbolic background, it has a powerful influence either on the auspicious or the brooding nuance of the created lexical formations.

Provided that in the traditional interpersonal perceptions white reflects an affirmative semantic quality, the unpropitious experiences expressed through it are presented as an unexpected coincidence. Moreover, the almost equalized presence of positive and negative concepts based on that color variation arises as a common component.
