

ONOMASTICS (THE TYPE OF THE POLITICIAN AND OF THE DEMAGOGUE) IN THE COMEDIES OF ION LUCA CARAGIALE

Adelina ILIESCU
University of Craiova

Abstract

In this paper, we shall try to analyze two characters from Ion Luca Caragiale's work: the type of the politician and of the demagogue. We shall analyze these characters etymologically and semantically. For this type of analysis, we shall use a dictionary that will include a great part of the names that we have referred to above.

Key-words: onomastics, proper names, comedy, character, irony

Résumé

Dans ce travail on va essayer d'analyser deux types appartenant à l'œuvre d'Ion Luca Caragiale: le type du politicien et du démagogue, du point de vue étymologique et sémantique. On va recourir pour ce type d'analyse à un dictionnaire qui comprend une bonne partie des noms auxquels on a fait référence.

Mots-clés: onomastique, noms propres, comédie, personnage, ironie

The justification of having chosen this theme can be related to the framing of the characters into types, personalized by language and onomastics – the demagogue, the foolish believer (cuckold), the sycophantic and duplicitous servant, the coquette woman, the confidant, etc.

Pompiliu Constantinescu identified nine types of characters in the comedies of I.L. Caragiale: the foolish believer (Dumitrache, Trahanache, Pampon, Crăcănel), the first lover (Chiriac, Rică, Tipătescu, Nae Girimea), the type of the coquette and adulterine woman, the type of politician and the demagogue (Nae Cațavencu, Farfuridi, Dandanache), the citizen (master Leonida, the winebibber), the office clerk (the candidate), the confidant (Eftimița), the raisonneur (Nae Ipingescu, Brânzovenescu), the servant (Pristanda).

We shall analyze the two types that we could capture in Caragiale's work, through which satire is achieved, and which the playwright directs against contemporary society, meaning the politician and the demagogue.

The type of the politician and of the demagogue

Agamemnon (Agamiță) Dandanache (Sp, Carag.) – From the characters of the play, Dandanache (the pickle man) has the most savory appellation, the most commented. G. Ibrăileanu argues that 'it rhymes with the comic softening of the brain through the hilarious diminutive of the terrible name Agamemnon that Trahanache pronounces Gagamiță and that renders the fall into childhood of this soft-witted man; through the notional content and sonority of the word dandanache = pickle and the suffix 'ache' (a diminutive from Greek, mainly used for proper names), also common to the name Trahanache and by the sum of all these. And the word dandana (pickle, fuss) fits his part in the play: the unexpected change of the deputy candidate, Zoe's despair for having lost the love letter, etc. and moreover, the old pickle with "Bang! To the war!". In the same survey, the critic speaks about the Greek origin of the character by his name and surname, showing that Dandanache lisps (little bro', ducky, fo'ty-eight), a fact that represents an argument in favor of the same idea.

I. Constantinescu demonstrates how the psychic automatism is contained in the name, by the repetition of the same sounds in the sound body (dan-da-na-che) and how nature argues against the character's significance (the degradation of the name, from Agamemnon to Agamiță, symbolizes the degradation of the character). Anyway, the caricature intention is obvious: the character has nothing in common with Menelaus' brother (and more likely if the bachelor's name had been Achilles nobody would have been surprised!). A tragic character in the works of Homer, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides and Voltaire, Agamemnon is now designated to define through negation and contrast.

Aside from the official act (the dispatch from the Center), no one respects his name. Agamiță or worse, this Gagamiță stick perfectly to the character's structure. It is a typically Greek name in Caragiale's work, most of the times vulgarized by the opposition between its referential and connotative meaning; Agamemnon was the king of Mycenae, a hero from Iliad, the leader of the Achaean army in the Trojan War. The elements of the compound belong to some incompatible semantic spheres as Agamemnon receives positive heroic connotations, while Agamiță is depreciatively connoted because of the diminutive sense received. Agamiță Dandanache through the ridiculous diminutive of the name Agamemnon, the vigorous hero of Troy that Trahanache pronounces Gagamiță renders the fall into childhood of this decrepit man. The depreciative connotation of the name Agamiță also includes an aggravating shade: "Give me that Gagamiță in writing, so I will not forget his name!" - Trahanache asks Tipătescu (Sp, act III, scene IV), a sign that, after having caught Cațavencu with "another bigger blunder", not even the fact that Dandanache had been imposed from the center has any relevance for him, this way, the character remaining only with the label of nuts - a fact which would be demonstrated copiously in the scenes II and III from act IV. The fact that Agamiță would have shown himself more scoundrel than Cațavencu in terms of political blackmail simply offers strength to that label which intertwines, like in a curse, on the coordinates of the same destiny, the worthless heroism and the prank of nature, the trouble and the pickle of Dâmbovița. Dandanache is a derivative formed with the suffix -ache from dandana "unpleasant accident, annoyance, trouble feast, topsy-turvy" (DLR, 200); dandanaie, a version of dandanaie "caper, mischief" (DNFR, 165). Caragiale made Farfuride a Greek only by using a suffix. Dandanache is made a Greek by name and surname. He is less Romanized than Farfuride.

Iordache Brânzovenescu (SP, Carag.) - Brânzovenescu is a derivative from Brânzoveanu (<Brânzoveni< Cheese< Cheese name) + suff. -escu. Iordache Brânzovenescu and Farfuridi form together a comic couple both by their behavior and by their names that are related to the culinary art. Therefore, the names of Brânzovenescu and Farfuridi suggest the lack of any political qualities.

Physically, it is unknown how Brânzovenescu looks like; but, it seems that the directors have imagined him, in most of the cases, as Farfuridi's opposite. Thus, the following picture was stated in public performances: a strong Farfuridi and a thin-gutted, tiny, hesitating Brânzovenescu, crushed by the former's presence and personality.

Even in terms of clothing the two characters have found their commenters: 'what leads the heroes of Caragiale in their clothing choices is, above all, pretension. One time, the author tells it directly: at the end of The Lost Letter, together with 'other cleaner electors', Farfuridi and Branzovenescu appear 'in provincial pretension suits'¹. The idea of kitsch, uniformity, formal obedience to certain rules already verified is also felt in the aspect of the characters. And then, through his social and political status, Brânzovenescu must fit in this blanket without excrescences.

Nae Cațavencu (Sp, Carag.) Nae is a hypocoristic form of Nicolae, becoming through excessive use, synonymous with stupid (Graur, NP, 156). Cațavencu < cațaveica (rural coat) + suff. -encu (> Slavonic -enku). His name suggests demagoguery if we relate it to the appellative "hellcat" or to the verb a cățai, meaning "to tittle-tattle". The sense of cață is also found in the text when the character is characterized as 'lively and barking'.

From an anthropological point of view, the character is "privileged". He belongs to a category with inconceivable names, a fact that brings with itself the importance of the character (only the expletive characters that are not emphasized have common names: Ionescu, Popescu). The demagoguery of Cațavencu is announced even before the appearance of the character, by the name "with its sharp syllables and ridiculous profile (that) renders perfectly the demagogue latrans".² The others speak to him in the most various ways, according to the situation or according to the degree of intimacy: the priest Pripici caresses him ("Bury me, my soul, bro', do not read!"), Pristanda speaks impersonally about him ("the back windows of Mr. Nae Catavencu") or treats him obsequiously and begs for intimacy ("Forgive me, master Nick!"), Tipătescu is ironic, formal ("beloved Mr. Cațavencu") until he loses his temper ("Let's forget about the phrases, uncle Catavencu!") and the Citizen -in his typical manner- graces him with a "S'r (sir) Nae!" that seems to fit him best.

Tache Farfuridi (Sp, Carag.) – Tache is a hypocoristic form of Dumitrache. Cf. also the Bulgarian Take, Greek Taki(s), Italian Tacchi (DNFR, p. 440) or Tache < Costache, Panaitache, Petrache (Graur, NP, 60).

His name approaches the name of Iordache Brânzovenescu by their culinary allusion that suggests, as Ibrăileanu had remarked "inferiority, vulgarity and flunk-eism"³; then, they got closer by their political beliefs. It becomes obvious that they are inseparable and go together anytime, anywhere. Farfuridi belongs to the category of unreal, impossible names (next to Trahanache, Cațavencu, Brânzovenescu, Pristanda, and even Tipătescu), unlike Ionescu, Popescu that are real plausible names.

Farfuridi is a derivative from farfara (whiffler) with the suffix -dis. Farfara is formed from the appellative farfara (babbler, gossip) and considers the nature of the personage (DNFR, 194). The suffix of the name Farfuridi denotes its Greek origin. By its name, the character is “the representative of the lawyers at the time of Caragiale, assiduous defenders of the party or the political group they belonged to, ready to betray it if their personal interests dictated this - ready to improvise demagogic speeches in which they were shamelessly mixing the people, the country and ‘our ancestors’ taken as witnesses to their quackeries”⁴. As far as the character’s intellectual (in)sufficiency is concerned, the opinions are divided: Farfuridi is a “fool”, although “we cannot appreciate (...) the character’s stupidity through the cleverness of the viewer; the stupidity of a character can only be measured by the stupidity or wisdom of other characters”⁵. As an ideologist of the party, Farfuridi has a temperate, even cautious attitude. Afraid of “shocks”, he actually expresses the principle of the world he lives in.

¹ Ștefan Cazimir, I.L. Caragiale față cu kitschul, București, Editura pentru Literatură, 1988, p. 98.

² G. Ibrăileanu, Numele proprii în opera comică a lui Caragiale, in Opere III, București, Editura Minerva, 1976, p. 69.

³ G. Ibrăileanu, Numele proprii în opera comică a lui Caragiale, in Opere III, București, Editura Minerva, 1976, p. 48.

Zacharia Trahanache (Sp, Carag.), the President of the Permanent Committee, Electoral committee, school committee, Agricultural Committee – Zaharias is a theophoric biblical Hebrew name that continues the personal name Zekharyah, a compound deciphered “Jahve remembered”; we have old forms attested beginning with the XVI century (DENB, 96). Trahanache is a derivative from the Greek trahanas “pap” (Graur, NP, 128) + suffix -ache. His dominant characteristic is the “ticking” (slowness) remarkably revealed - on one hand - by the illustrious formula, uttered even in his moments of energy: (“Have a little patience!”) and – on the other hand - by the name Trahanache, derived from trahana – a soft dough - and Zachariah who takes us to sugary, suggesting old age.

Trahanache comes from the types of classic comedy: the old man, the deceived husband, the fool who lives in good harmony with the traitor, the classical triangle, etc. Therefore, by language and clothing (hat and walking stick), he is part of the old layer where the latest silts have found their place⁶.

The part of the character is very important: that of ensuring a certain rhythm to the play. With his endless “have a little patience!”, Trahanache postpones, hurries or ingrains a slow motion to the action that sometimes seems to be out of control. As a mental structure, he is the opposite of boss Dumitrache. The latter is characterized by a hardly controlled impulsivity, while Trahanache is the much-tested placidity and compelled to argue against the others⁷. Often compared with boss Dumitrache, Trahanache shares with him, Pampon (Pom-Pom) and Crăcănel (Cratchit) the category of the cuckold. Trahanache is a mixed typology, belonging to both the politician and the demagogue type, along with Rică Venturiano, Tipătescu, Cațavencu, Farfuridi, Brânzovenescu, Dandanache.

The same type in the making

Boss Dumitrache Titircă Bad-Heart (Nf, Carag.) – Jupân is 1. a courtesy title given in the Romanian Countries to those who held certain dignities or high offices; a courtesy title given to a person, equivalent to “gentleman”, “master”; 2. employer, owner (DEX, 551); Boss Dumitrache has an honorable social status that makes him

⁴Mircea Tomuș, Opera lui I.L. Caragiale, I, București, Editura Minerva, 1977, p. 67.

⁵Mircea Tomuș, op. cit., p. 68.

⁶Constantin Cubleșan, Dicționarul personajelor din teatrul lui I.L. Caragiale, Cluj-Napoca, Editura Dacia, 2002, p. 267.

⁷Ștefan Cazimir, Caragiale - Universul comic, București, Editura Pentru Literatură. 1967, p. 99.

feel very proud as he is a lumberman (the man who produces or sells lumber) and a captain in the civic guard.

Dumitrache is a derivative from Dumitru (< Gr. Δημήτριος) + suffix -ache. Titircă cf. Titirică < Polish Teter, Titera and Bulgarian Titirinov. cf. also to the appellative titirez (spinner) (DNFR, 453). The name of the character is serious, typical of a person involved in a serious trading business. Boss Dumitrache is considered an upstart. In reality, the character is to a lesser extent an upstart (nouveau riche) than he might seem at a first glance. He does not possess that passion to amaze through wealth or culture. His house has “wooden and straw furniture”, a modest and inexpensive interior. Boss Dumitrache is not one of those who prefer to show up at fashion shows. He is a “merchant”, that is, situated on the highest level of the social pyramid of the slum. Compared with Ghiță Țircădău, his former brother-in-law, he is a better, more respectable and successful merchant. Trading is a profession based on money, on gain. To succeed in this profession means to produce money. Or, Boss Dumitrache is a successful merchant. His greed is best emphasized by his nickname “Who baptized him Titircă Bad-Heart, baptized him very well!” (Spiridon).

Ionescu (Sp, Carag.) – is a surname and a derivative from Ion (John) + suffix -escu. By his name, the teacher betrays his modest extraction, but especially the lack of personality. He is part of those who rise from the lower classes. (Until then the people were the bourgeoisie). The two are part of the largest army of the Ionescu and Popescu that are overcrowding around Cațavencu and Farfuridi.

Lefter Popescu (DL, Carag.) – The name of the character is suggestive, although it comes from Elefterie (free man) (Graur, NP, 84); Lefter means poor, penniless. Lefter is a slangy term used in order to show the precarious material condition of the character. He feeds on the illusion that he could get rich unexpectedly, although initially he shows himself distrustful of his chance to win, pessimistic, according to his own confession: “You’ve found it! Me and the luck!” (self-characterization). Popescu is a common name that shows the character’s mediocrity. Lefter Popescu is addicted to the lottery. Once he has lost his money, job and hope, he becomes out of pocket, Lefter Popescu. His first name, Lefter is filled with the signification of his adventures. Up to that moment ridiculous, the union of the two names gets now a tragic resonance: he is from all the points of view, on the rocks⁸. Al. Rosetti, B. Cazacu, Liviu Onu⁹ order Lefter “among the loans due to the impulse that the Greeks gave to our commercial life”. Lefter, “without any penny/dime”, has established itself as a familiar term in the language of card and poker players, for example in the phrase “to leave someone dead broke” or “to get somebody’s money to the last penny”. Lefter gave rise to a derivative: the noun lefterie that evolved to the sense of “credit, trust, consideration, authority”. Lefterie has suffered a semantic movement, becoming a synonym of “honesty”, “moral (credit)”.

Nae Ipingescu (Nf, Carag) – Nae is a hypocoristic form of Nicolae, made, due to its excessive use, synonymous with stupid (Graur, NP, 156). Ipingescu is a derivative of the appellative ipinge “a man’s coat made of baize or cloth (hooded and with chenille) or “the fabric of which the garment described above is made” (DLMR, 394). Nae Ipingescu has nothing to do with lower tailoring (ipinge) or shoemaking

⁸Gh. Tohăneanu, Lefter Popescu, in Orient latin, no. 1 (58), 2008, Timișoara, anul XIII, p. 11.

⁹*Istoria limbii române literare*, vol. I, București, Editura Minerva, p. 439.

(pingea); on the contrary, it suggests a common occupation and imbecility. Nae Ipingescu is a bailiff, political friend of the captain from the civic guard, Titircă Dumitrache. In this double quality, he participates directly, being a permanent presence in the house at 6 Catilina Street and being indirectly the lumberman's confidant, in the life of the Dumitrache family. To him will the jealous husband trust the adventures from the Iunion garden, the doubts about Veta and will describe "the vagabond employee", Rică Venturiano. He participates in the night tours of the guard with his friend and is a witness to several scenes between Zița, Titircă's sister-in-law and her ex-husband, Ghiță Țircădău. He is the first that recognizes "the citizen, Rică Venturiano, a judicial employee, a student at the Academy and editor at The Voice of the National Patriot".

Spiridon (Nf, Carag.) – the name has a Greek origin Σπυρίδων < σπυρίς, - ιδος "little bread basket", arrived at us through a Slavonic and Neo-Greek branch (MEO, 260). It is a serious name, chosen by Caragiale, along with Boss Dumitrache, as they are attributed to some people who have a serious trading business. Spiridon is the youngest character of the play. He is a child or, in the best case, a teenager. All the other characters patronize him, and when, finally, the real identity of Rică is revealed, it can be seen that everybody establishes an equal to equal relationship between them, except Spiridon who remains in the same inferior position where he was placed from the beginning. There is no physical data related to his appearance. All that we know is that he smokes. This vice is both his pleasure and his fear.

In conclusion, the name can characterize the types from the point of view of their nature or of the social classes that they belong to. Therefore, the characters are human types, of a classical style, having as a dominant feature a trait to which other features are subordinated, because the characters, although typical, are not realized schematically, but seen in their complexity

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Academia Română, Dicționarul explicativ al limbii române, București, Editura Academiei, 1998.
- Candrea, I.-A., Dicționarul limbii române din trecut și de astăzi, partea I, București, 1926-1931
- Caragiale, I. L., Opere 2, Momente, schițe, note critice, București, Editura de Stat pentru Literatură și Artă, 1960
- Caragiale, I. L., Opere 1-4, ediție critică de Al. Rosetti, Șerban Cioculescu și Liviu Călin, București, Editura de Stat pentru Literatură și Artă și Editura pentru Literatură, 1959-1965
- Cazimir, Ștefan, Caragiale – universul comic, Editura pentru Literatură, București, 1967
- Constantinescu, N.A., Dicționar onomastic românesc (DOR), București, Editura Academiei, 1963
- Cubleșan, Constantin (coordonator), Dicționarul personajelor din teatrul lui I.L. Caragiale, Cluj-Napoca, Editura Dacia, 2002.
- Graur, Al., Nume de locuri, București, Editura Academiei, 1963
- Ibrăileanu, G., Numele proprii în opera comică a lui Caragiale, in Opere III, București, Editura Minerva, 1976
- Ionescu, Christian, Mică enciclopedie onomastică, București, Editura Enciclopedică Română, 1975 (MEO).
- Iordan, Iorgu, Dicționar al numelor de familie românești (DNFR), București, Editura Științifică și Enciclopedică, 1983
- Iordan, Iorgu, Toponimia românească, București, Editura Academiei, 1963

Pătruț, I., Nume de persoană și nume de locuri românești, București, Editura Științifică și Enciclopedică, 1984

Pătruț, I., Onomastică românească, București, Editura Științifică și Enciclopedică, 1980

Tomuș, Mircea, Opera lui I.L. Caragiale, I, București, Editura Minerva, 1977.