

‘NOTHING’ OR ‘ANYTHING’: TERMS IN IRISH AND SCOTTISH GAELIC

SEOSAMH WATSON

Abstract. This paper constitutes an analysis of those terms which supply the concepts ‘nothing’, ‘anything’, as employed in negative, interrogative or conditional statements in the Gaelic branch of Celtic. The study, based on data published in the Linguistic atlas and survey of Irish dialects (1958-69) and supplemented by a small number of additional sources, categorises the results into 2 main classes. One of these consists of inherited terms of diverse origins, such as pronominal and adjectival forms, while the other is based on human activity of various types, including the use of the senses, coinage and other measures, as well as movement and creativity generally. The terms in question may also be qualified by numerous adjectival or adverbial phrases – some quite striking – in the sense of ‘any, at all’. The picture which emerges serves to indicate the great range and variety of expression involved.

0.1. The concepts of ‘nothing’, or ‘anything’, as employed in negative, interrogative or conditional statements, feature in a number of answers to the 1,180 item questionnaire posed for Irish and Scottish Gaelic dialects in the 1950-60s by the late Professor Heinrich Wagner. These data were published (together with data excerpted from an earlier source for the language of the Isle of Man (Manx) in vols ii-iv of his Linguistic atlas and survey of Irish dialects (henceforth LASID). The items in question are reproduced at the end of the present article. It is proposed to analyse here the nature of the terms employed by informants at the various LASID points. There are 86 Irish points in the atlas, together with material from 3 supplementary points, indicated by an ‘a’ following the numeral of the main associated point. Since, however, Wagner employed a reduced version of his questionnaire at a number of points and collected from only 7 points in Gaelic Scotland – none of these in the east of the country – it is intended to supplement the overall material through the use of a small number of additional sources. (Those headwords taken from LASID are rendered here throughout in bold typeface.) In the Gaelic dialects of Ireland, Scotland and the Isle of Man (see Figure 1) the non-plural sense of ‘nothing’ or, in negative, interrogative or conditional or sentences, ‘anything’ may be rendered by means of one of a large number of lexemes. One method features a noun used with pronominal meaning<sup>1</sup>, such as Irish ceann ‘one’, lit. ‘head’, duine or té ‘person’, the latter also in Scottish, tè, but here with fem. reference. Scottish employs gin, originally ‘offspring, creature’, with common reference and fear ‘man’ with masc. reference, as do some N.Irish dialects. These latter also employ bean, lit. ‘woman’, with fem. reference, cf. O’Rahilly (1972: 230). Dialects of this language also use forms of the first ordinal numeral aon with common reference. Forms of the foregoing pronominal type, unlike the majority of the terms discussed below, can also normally be used in positive sentences (cf. English I have one versus **I have any*) and so are excluded from discussion. Also excluded are expressions signifying ‘anything else’ as distinct from merely ‘anything’, as well as the range of terms employed in the expression ‘not worth a (button, bean)’ etc, together with various strategies which render the notions in question without the use of a particular substantive lexeme, such as by means of gan/ gun ‘without’ (except in the expression signifying ‘gratis’) or the prefixation of deagh- ‘good’ as qualifier to the substantive negated by the verb, as exemplified in Wentworth (2003: 521). The items remaining to be discussed here may generally be classified in two groups. One of these refers ultimately to certain of the senses or relates in some way to human activities, while the other, which is more in the nature of a catch-all, contains inherited words of diverse origins. Lexemes employed in these various classes may be qualified adjectivally or adverbially with the sense of ‘any, at all’ and such qualifiers are dealt with under the headword. Phrases used to this end are fairly numerous – many of them quite picturesque – and no attempt is made here to enumerate them all. What will be seen to emerge overall is the great range and variety of expression used in signifying the concepts in question.

<sup>1</sup> For a discussion of these forms, cf. Watson 2002.

1.0. This second group of terms referred to above will be dealt with first.

1.1.1. ní: this is the commonest term in this category and signifies ‘thing, object’. The substantive in question originated as the neuter gender equivalent of the indefinite personal pronoun nech ‘someone, anyone’, cf. Thurneysen 1961: 311. In common with the majority of the words under discussion, it is normally found in combination with a qualifier so as to give the sense of ‘any at all’. Such qualifiers include the first cardinal numeral aon in the sense of ‘any’ (which gives rise to orthographic forms such as éinní, aoinní, cf. McKenna (1935: 45, 893); and air bith (Scottish sam bith), literally ‘in the world’. Other well-known intensifying expressions, such as (following) go Dia (‘unto God’), (preceding) dheamhan, diabhal ‘devil (the one)’ in Irish, cf. McKenna (1935: 893), donas (‘evil’) etc, in Scottish Gaelic, signifying ‘not a single one’, cf. colloquial English not a damned one! have not been recorded in LASID in connection with the terms under discussion. Within Ireland the form in question, ní, is indicated by LASID as commonest in the southern province, where 61 occurrences are recorded. It appears but rarely in the west (Connacht) and north (Ulster), in each of which provinces only a single instance is recorded. It does, however, also occur in Scottish Gaelic where LASID notes it as being quite common in the south and southwest. Other sources, however, record its use in northern and eastern areas of Scotland also<sup>2</sup>.

1.1.2. nithinn: in Scotland are also found a number of forms which, though clearly based on ní, have not had their origin satisfactorily explained thus far, except insofar as it can be said that they do not appear to contain a familiar Gaelic diminutive suffix such as -an, -ein. LASID shows instances of the form in question, namely nithinn [N'ix'ən] at one Scottish point. To this may be compared instances from other sources, such as /nix'ɪn/, /nix'ən/, /niən / from an eastern mainland dialect (Ó Murchú 1989: 380). A comparable form, namely [N'ixɛ̃], which lacks the final nasal, is recorded for south-western Scotland in LASID. This, if correct, may point to a plural form as origin.

1.2. a bheag: the second term under discussion in this class consists of the adjective beag 'small, little', Early Irish bec, cf. Welsh bychan, of unknown origin, cf. LEIA (: B-24) in substantival usage, thus 'a small amount', preceded by 3 sg. m. poss. adj. a, used here with common gender reference, i.e. 'of it/ that (/anything)'. This same sense of beag is recorded in the proverb D'aighe ní aithním a bheag (lit. 'Your mind I know not its little') 'I don't know your mind at all'; and the usage should be compared to expressions such as ní beag sin 'that's enough' cá beag sin? 'isn't that enough?' (Ó Dónaill 1977: s.v. beag) in which the adjective signifies 'a sufficiency', hence 'some', or, when negated, 'nothing'. The expression in question, a bheag 'any', has been recorded in a number of Scottish dialects and in the Isle of Man, veg, cf. LASID (: 173), McCone et al. (1994: 720) and is also familiar in north-eastern Ireland, cf. Watson (1984: 98). In Connacht and Munster it is often found in the expanded form a bheag ná a mhór lit. 'neither a little nor a lot (of it)', cf. McKenna (1935: 45).

1.3. cinéal: signifying 'kind, type', Early Irish cenél, (cf. Lat. re-cens, Gk κατῷος, LEIA (: C-64-5, C-103), this term is found qualified by ar bith 'any' and occurs in LASID at one point in Connacht. This latter expression which will be encountered on numerous occasions in the following discussion signifies literally 'on earth [world]', and an alternative expression, which involves another word for world, namely domhan, is found in other sources.

2.0. The second major classification of the terms in question consists of a number of categories based on human activities, the majority of these concerning the senses. The first of the categories to be dealt with consists of words which we may say are loosely based on the sense of touch, inasmuch as the terms in question involve spatial existence.

<sup>2</sup> Wentworth (2003: 27); Watson (fieldnotes); Ó Murchú (1989: 379)

2.1. *dada, tada etc: by far the commonest collection of terms used in the entirety of the dialects under consideration comprises those in dad-, tad-, forms of which occur in dialects of each of the Irish provinces considered, with comparable ones being general in Scotland. The commonly accepted origin of the forms in question is that they derive from a learned medieval Lat. borrowing, atomus, Middle Irish adom[h], cf. LEIA (: D-7), to which an unhistorical initial dental has been prefixed. Forms with this initial d- are found in LASID materials in the Irish provinces from south to north in the following proportions: Munster 12; Connacht 60; Ulster 34. The Gaelic system of initial mutations<sup>3</sup> has worked analogically on the form in question, giving rise to a separate form in initial t-. The western province, Connacht, appears to be the focus for this form where LASID records no less than 97 instances, while Munster shows a single case and Ulster, like Scotland, has none at all. Dad- forms have evolved final [i], or [u], either as reinforcement of final unstressed -a or by analogy with substantival morphology – though the [u] may possibly represent original -amh – while those in tad- have likewise final [ə] or [i]. The latter forms are recorded in LASID without accompanying qualification – though de Bhaldraithe (1959: 480) cites tada ar bith – whereas those given in LASID for dad- may be preceded by aon, or succeeded by ar chor ar bith ‘at all’ (lit. ‘under any condition’).

2.2. *rud: the second major term in this category involves the modern reflex, rud, of Early Irish rét ‘wealth, possession’, cf. Sk rátanam ‘riches’, LEAI (: R-22). This is either qualified by preceding aon, or following ar bith/ sam bith. In Connacht and Munster the phrase can be completed by the adjective beo ‘alive’ as a further qualification, while in northern Irish dialects the qualification may be extended by cothrom, indicating ‘just, fair’. Rud is also familiar in the modern languages in a quasi-pronominal sense ‘which’, which introduces relative clauses. As elements of this type are less prominent in terms of sentence stress, such usage may well account for the loss of historical vowel length and quality in the case of this word. Expressions signifying ‘anything, nothing’ in which rud figures are common in all three Irish provinces, as also in Scottish Gaelic and Manx. The proportions in Ireland in the LASID materials in this instance are: Munster 19; Connacht 50; Ulster 13.

<sup>3</sup> For details concerning the operation of these mutations, see Watson (1997).

2.3.1. neamhní: this compound involving ní (v. 1.1.1) plus neg. prefix, is given by McKenna (1935: 894) for Connacht and Munster with the general sense of 'nothing (existing)' or of '(bringing or getting) nothing'. It is also cited by Lane (1922: 1088) where the expression níl ionnaibh ach n. 'ye are but nought', is from an archaic, literary source.

2.3.2. náit: this word, which should be compared in sense to the foregoing, is a borrowing of English naught. According to McKenna (1935: 893) it is an exclusively Munster term and may be employed in wide range of expressions, e.g. in the sense of nothing being ar 'on' a person, i.e. as an affliction, cf. 5.3.2.

2.3.3. puinn: this term recorded by Ó Dónaill (1977: 975) in the senses of 'nothing being wrong with one', or 'gaining nothing of advantage'. It is a borrowing of French point, DIL (s.v. point), LEIA (: P-11). The latter, earlier, form is reported from the 13th cent. in the sense 'profit, avail'. As a term it is also recorded in the literature of the era with the meaning 'particle, small amount, minimum', very often in negative sentences, and it continues in this use in the dialects of Munster, cf. O'Rahilly (1972: 243) and Ó Cuív (1944: 122) to the present day, e.g. níor shiúlas puinn 'I walked none', ní chodlainn puinn dí 'I slept none of it (the night)'.

2.4. seo(i)d: the final term to be mentioned in this connection is found at one LASID point in Munster, gan seod, in the sense of 'without anything' i.e. 'gratis, for no payment'. The word (Early Irish sét 'brooch, jewel', an i-stem substantive) may derive from native sét 'treasure, wealth, possession', itself an o-stem < **swanto-* (cf. Welsh chwant 'desire'), if not a borrowing of Lat. fibula, cf. LEIA (: S-99). It is also recorded by McKenna (1935: 893) in the expression ní raibh seoid air 'there was nothing [amiss] on him', and by Lane (1922: 1088) níl seoid aige 'he has nothing'. McKenna (1935: 894) also indicates for Munster dialects that the word may be qualified by an bharra 'of profit'. Though somewhat like the English jot, the dissimilar vowel length, together with the existence of a – no doubt related – form in Scottish Gaelic, seud, with identical meaning of 'nothing', makes it likely that both descend from sét 'jewel, precious thing'. Buck (1949: 442) connects this word to Lat. (originally Gaulish) sentis 'thornbush', which is an interesting suggestion in view of another jewellery term, namely Early Irish delg, Modern Irish dealg which has the sense both of 'thorn' and 'brooch'.

2.5.1. pioc: this is the first of a small number of items in this section which are clearly English loan-words. Pioc, cf. English pick, though not recorded by LASID outside of Munster and Connacht, is clearly well known in these provinces, with 14 and 22 appearances respectively. As with most of the previous terms, it may be qualified by aon or ar bith. Nor is it unknown in a similar sense in Scotland, since there is an instance recorded in an eastern dialect (Dorian 1978: 101) in the phrase cha d'ith mi pic [sic] 'didn't eat anything'.

2.5.2. bit: unrecorded in LASID but well-known from other sources, are a number of further terms which should be mentioned. Some of these are fairly restricted in distribution and a few are English loanwords. The first of these, a borrowing from English bit, appears in a number of Scottish dialects, cf. Wentworth (2003: 26).

2.6. fríd: 'tiny amount, trace', cf. Ó Dónaill (1977: 581) fríd an gháire 'faint smile', lit. 'trace of the smile'. This form, whose alternative and original meaning was a 'flesh-worm', is mainly found in the gen. as a qualifier of some of the other terms cited here, cf. 3.2, 6.4.1, so as to denote a still smaller amount. However, it does also occur independently with oiread 'amount' in the phrase oiread na fríde 'the amount of a mite, cf. McKenna (1935: 893) and Ó Dónaill (1977: 581). The corresponding Early Irish form of the word is frigit 'flesh-worm' for which MacBain (1982: 181) would propose a connection with the same IE root as English wriggle.

2.7.1. giob: a similar usage noted for the south and west by McKenna (1935: 108) involves this word in the sense of '[not a] stitch of clothes'. The lexeme in question is related to gioball 'rag' and is probably to be referred to Early Irish gob 'beak' (without etymology, but cf. Dan. gab 'mouth'), hence a 'shredded item'.

2.7.2. luid: within the same semantic field lies a word recorded by both McKenna (1935: 108) in the sense of 'nothing' with reference to 'money, clothes etc' and also by Lane (1922: 1088) in the expression oiread na luide (lit. 'the amount of nothing') referring to clothing. Luid appears to be the word which signifies, both in Irish and Scottish Gaelic, a 'rag'. Its etymology seems best regarded at present as undemonstrated, since MacBain's (1982: 236) suggestions linking it to the same root as Gk λύω etc do not appear to be substantiated.

2.8. heat: this term is recorded for a north-western Scottish dialect by Wentworth (2003: 27). Its usage appears to be in the context of 'not achieving anything'. The word in question is known to be Scots, cf. DSL (: s.v. haet) and originates in the substantivisation of the verbal phrase ha' it, abbreviated from ([Let] the Devil) have it! It is, thus, comparable in origin and development to English damn 'nothing', cf. damn it! > a damned thing > a damn!

2.9.1. pingin: Early Irish pinginn, is a borrowing from Old English penning, English penny, cf. LEIA (: P-9). The term in this case, as noted from a Connacht dialect,<sup>4</sup> has the sense of 'getting nothing', and makes reference to a unit of coinage still employed in the United Kingdom and also used in Ireland prior to the introduction of the euro in 2001.

2.9.2. ás: this word is cited by Dinneen (1927: s.v.) in two instances, one without attribution, and the other from a 19th cent. Connacht source, where it occurs in the phrase ás ar bith, in the context of 'gaining (nothing at all)'. The latter is also given by Lane (1922: 1089). The term, also known from 18th cent. Ulster vernacular poetry, is clearly a borrowing of English ace, which itself derives from Old Fr. ace 'unity', based on Lat. as, the Roman copper coin.

2.9.3. bonn: this term is cited by Lane (1922: 1088) in the expression níl bonn screas[a] aige with the meaning 'he has not (a scraped coin', i.e.) anything. Bonn, a common term for 'coin', perhaps from Lat. pundus, according to MacBain (1982: s.v.), is here qualified by the gen. of verbal noun scrios 'to destroy, scrape', the derivation of whose verb stem, Early Irish sceirt-, is obscure, but for which a connection with English squirt has been proposed, cf. LEIA (: S-39).

2.9.4. sciúrtóg: this is recorded (as sciúrtóg) by McKenna (1935: 894) with the meaning of (having) nothing of monetary value. The word in question falls, likewise, into the category of coinage, since the basic reference is to a 'valueless coin'. It is, moreover, recorded as a 'coin of little value' by Ó Muirthe (1996: 169) for an English dialect of N. Connacht. Dinneen (1927: s.v.) cites it in Connacht Irish as being a coin to the value of a quarter of the lowest denomination of coinage in use in Ireland in the early 20th century and derives it from sciorta (from English skirt) 'skirt, border, edge'. The implication here would be that the coin in question has been trimmed of some of its value. An alternative etymology, however, could connect it with sciúr 'to scour, scrub'.

2.9.5. screapall: this is a term which is noted by McKenna (1935: 108) for each of the Irish provinces. The sense given is of 'not (possessing/ asking for) monetary possessions' and, no doubt, as in the case of pinginn (2.6.2), the reference is to a measure now obsolete. Ó Muirthe (1996: 172), cites the variant form sgreatall for Munster, as does Lane (1922: 1088) in the expanded version sgreatal na ngrás, lit. 'of grace(s), i.e. 'not a blessed thing'. Ó Dónaill (1977: 1064) selects screatall as standardised form with the meaning in question and under screapall one is referred to another variant (: 1063), namely screaball which has the sense of 'tiny bit, morsel, shred', though, unlike under screatall, no illustrations of negative sentences are provided. The origin of the terms in question, is Lat. scripulus, (DEL: s.v. scrīpus) borrowed into Early Irish as screpul, also screebull, cf. LEIA (: S-53-4) signifying one twenty-fourth of an ounce, cf. Kelly (2000: 584).

<sup>4</sup> I am grateful to my colleague and friend, Prof. Séamas Ó Catháin, UCD Delargy Centre for Irish Folklore and the National Folklore Collection, for this information.

3.0. The second category to be discussed in this class pertains to the sense of sight and the number of terms in this particular section which have become generalised in their usage is noteworthy.

3.1.1. dath: the basic meaning of this first term is ‘colour’, Early Irish dath, ‘colour, flash’, cf. Lat. fax, facis ‘torch, flame’, cf. LEIA (: D-26). This word may have come into prominence in expressions of the kind being discussed on account of its phonetic similarity to dada (see above 3.1). As an expression it is particularly favoured by the northern Irish province (Ulster) where LASID cites 68 instances, with only 2 from Connacht and none each from either Munster or Scotland. It is often preceded by a which may either represent the poss. adj. referred to previously or, alternatively, represent a reduced form of the numeral aon (cf. Wagner 1959: 216). Whether or not preceded by a, it can be qualified ar bith/ ar chor ar bith with the sense of ‘at all’, but is not so qualified when preceded by an unreduced form of the numeral. The system of initial consonant mutations, referred to at 3.1, has led to variant forms in initial g-, e.g. gath, while developments in the vowel quality of the word have resulted in forms with palatalised initial, viz. geath, gheath. McKenna’s dictionary (1935: 45) records the expanded forms a dhubh ná a dhath, dubh ná dath, lit. ‘its black or colour’, as well as similar variants as being typical of Connacht or Munster dialects, while Lane (1922: 1088) cites an instance of the heightened poetic expression dath na ríogh ruadh (lit. ‘the ruddy kings’ colour’).

3.1.2. lí: this word is recorded by McKenna (1935: 45, 108) for Connacht and Munster in the phrase lí na léithe with the sense ‘nothing (left)’, lit. ‘the colour of greyness’, as well as lí léithe for Connacht (: 894), cf. also Ó Dónaill (1977: 781), ní raibh lí na léithe agam ‘I had not the slightest thing’. Lane (1922: 1088) records an alternative expression ní raibh lí lé ortha ‘there wasn’t the least thing on them’, with reference to clothing. Lí is referred by Lewis and Pedersen (1961: 7) to Lat. liuor, while MacBain (1982: 228) connects liath ‘grey’, from which the abstract noun léithe derives, with Sk. palitáh ‘grey (through age)’ and Lat. pallidus, cf. palleō (DEL: s.v.) to be connected with terms signifying ‘pale, pale-blue’ in I-E languages, e.g. Old Slav. plavŭ ‘λευκός’.

3.2. ceo: with the literal meaning of ‘mist’, Early Irish ceó ‘fog, mist’, cf. Goth. hiwi ‘appearance, Old English héow, hīw ‘appearance, face, colour’, LEIA (: C-68-9) and qualified by aon or ar bith, is an expression found in Connacht alone in the LASID materials. Ceó may be related to the adj. cía ‘dark brown’, cf. LEIA

(: C-69, 95) with connections to the same I-E root as Old English hár 'grey'. The word is found at a number of points in the western province and LASID furnishes us with no less than 19 instances from dialects of the western province. McKenna's dictionary (1935: 107) shows this (along with by-form sceo) and usage cited includes 'eating,' and 'doing'. With reference to sight only, apparently, the same source (: 893) quotes an expanded form from Connacht and Ulster beo ná ceo, lit. 'living being nor mist'. The same source also notes that that ceo, like faic (v. 6.4) can also be qualified through the addition of the substantive phrase na fríde (v. 2.6) lit. '[to the degree] of a (the) mite'.

3.3. seó: the English loan-word show in the sense of 'spectacle' as found in the expression aon seó puts in an appearance in a context without reference to 'seeing' at a single LASID point in Connacht.

3.4.1. leus: the lexical collection from a north-western Scottish dialect previously referred to furnishes our two final examples in this category. The first of these is leus 'light, blaze' (Wentworth 2003: 790). It is used exclusively in this instance with reference to sight. The Early Irish form in question is lés for which a connection to Old Norse ljós has been proposed, cf. DIL (s.v.lés).

3.4.2. poídh: similarly restricted to the sense of 'anything, nothing' with regard to vision is the word given orthographically in the collection as poídh (Wentworth 2003: 790). I have encountered the same word in a similar context in a related eastern Scottish dialect during fieldwork and would suggest that it may represent a by-form of foillse 'light, manifestation', as cited by Dwelly (1977: 446) from Armstrong's dictionary. The initial consonant would have been altered through hypercorrection resulting from the effects of the system of initial mutations (see above 3.1). Foillse is in origin the abstract noun of adj. folas, Early Irish follus 'clear' < **fo- solus*, based on solus 'light', which LEIA (: S-169) analyses as a compound of **su-* 'good, well' and lés, v 3.4.1 above). Lewis and Pedersen (1961: 104), however, would derive solus from **su-* and **luks-*, in respect of which cf. Lat. lūx, Gk λενκό, Sk. ruc-, Old English leōt.

3.4.3. scaile: also to be included here, it would seem, is another term recorded in McKenna (1935: 893) where it is used to signify 'nothing' with reference to news, information or doing a piece of work. It is listed here on the basis that the word in question is scal (gen. scaile) a 'burst, flash', which the palatal final would render likely, cf. also Scottish sgail 'splendour, brightness; flash, flame', obsolete according to Dwelly (1977: 812). On the other hand, the possibility should not be ruled out that the word is, in origin, a variant of Early Irish caile 'spot'.

3.5. steama: the concluding item of this section is recorded in the collection from a north-western Scottish dialect made by Wentworth (2003: 27, 525), where it is used in the sense of ‘not (achieving) anything’. The non-Gaelic dental stop in the source in question indicates unequivocally the foreign origin of the term and its origin is clearly the Scots word stime, cf. SND (: s.v.), with variants stym(e), stem(e), which apparently developed in this language from the sense, in negative sentences, of ‘(not being able to see) anything’ which developed, via the meaning of a ‘least visible appearance’, to signifying more generally ‘the least particle of anything, a jot or atom’. The word in question may possibly be connected with the similar Scots form stim ‘haze, mist, e.g. on the sea’ which is referred by the same source to Swedish dialectal stimba, stimma ‘steam, fog’.

4.0. The next category arises from the sense of hearing.

4.1. sian: this, together with the following entry, would appear to be the only terms whose use has been extended beyond the semantic range indicating ‘hearing’. In the sense of ‘anything, nothing’ the word is usually spelt sìon in Scottish Gaelic. As such, it has been recorded at 2 locations in LASID, but is attested to in a number of other dialects also. Wentworth (2003: 755), for example, quotes chan fhaigh thu sraing air sìon ‘you won’t get string for nothing’. The spelling sìon connects the word in question to a lexeme signifying ‘weather’, which is MacBain’s (1982: 324) preferred etymology. In my view, however, the sense of ‘scream, shriek’ and, by extension, ‘voice’, cf. related Irish siansa ‘strain, melody’, siansán ‘humming, whistling; cry, clamour’, provides a preferable point of departure for the development in question, especially in view of the similar usage involved with seinm, dùrd, etc below. The Early Irish form sian ‘chant, musical air’ from which the word in question derives has no established etymology.

4.2. seinm: in connection with the foregoing item it is perhaps worth quoting the single instance of the semantically related form seinm, whose basic sense is ‘playing (music)’, which is recorded in LASID. Seinm ar bith is returned for a Connacht dialect as a response in the context of ‘(doing) anything’. This is the verbal noun of seinn ‘play’, Early Irish senn-, which MacBain (1982: s.v. seinn) connects with the same IE root as Lat sonus.

4.3. guth: the remaining terms are restricted to express the meaning only of ‘hearing anything/ nothing’. The first of these is guth ‘voice’, hence ‘sound’. LASID has a listing for this at two Scottish points, Wentworth (2003: 27) notes it in his collection and it is also familiar to me in this same sense from a related eastern dialect. Lane (1922: 1089) notes its use in Ireland also in the phrase nìor chualas guth dhe 'I didn't hear word of it', which is to be connected with the usage cited by Ó Dónaill (1977: 680) fuaireamar an guth 'we got (the) word' [i.e. message]. The Early Irish form guth 'voice' has no generally accepted etymology.

4.4. dùrd: this word which signified originally 'humming' has come to mean 'sound' or 'word' in a number of Scottish dialects and, although not listed by LASID in the sense of ('hearing) not a/ any word', this is a meaning recorded by Wentworth (2003: 790) in his dialect study and one which is likewise very familiar to me from a neighbouring eastern variety of Scottish Gaelic. For Irish, Lane (1922: 1088) lists, with reference to speech, the expression níor labhair sé druid (nó druid) 'he didn't utter [a syllable or sound]', where the latter two substantives are evidently variant forms of the common Modern Irish dord, 'drone, hum, murmur; (deep) chant; bass', corresponding to Early Irish dórd. LEIA (: D-175-6) refers the latter to an IE root **der-*, with connections such as Hesychius δάρδα 'bee'.

4.5. focal: information for a N. Connacht<sup>5</sup> dialect indicates the use of this word to signify 'nothing' solely with reference to speech. This usage is confirmed in both McKenna's (1935: 894) and de Bhaldraithe's dictionaries (1959: 480). It is generally regarded as a loanword deriving from a Lat. source in voc-.

4.6. puth: the basis significance of this word is 'puff' and it is known in this sense in Irish and Scottish dialects. It is recorded by Dorian (1978: 101) for an eastern mainland dialect of Scotland as 'nothing' in the context of hearing. As to the origin of the word, it may very likely be a borrowing from English puff, though it could also have arisen independently on an onomatopoeic basis.

4.7. diog: this word, though not familiar to me in the sense in question is, however, cited by Wentworth (2003: 525) with the meaning 'anything, nothing' in relation to the action of an item of machinery. It is clearly a borrowing from English, cf. tick (as of a clock), with which signification also it is used in the dialect referred to.

4.8. cneadadh: from N.W. Scotland, Wentworth (2003: 27) comes this instance of a particular term used exclusively with reference to having an ailment. Itself a verbal noun, of cnead 'groan, sigh, moan', cneadadh is employed as object of the verbal noun of fairich 'feel'. For the Early Irish substantive cnet 'sigh, moan' a connection has been posited, cf. LEIA (: C-131), with Sk. kiknasa 'crushed'

<sup>5</sup> Information from Prof. Séamas Ó Catháin.

5.0. The final category connected to the senses is that of taste.

5.1. blas: the only instance within this category that LASID provides is blas ‘taste’, qualified by aon or ar bith and not restricted, as confirmed by McKenna (1935: 893), to food. Again the focus is the western Irish province of Connacht with 5 examples from 4 atlas points. The distribution is comparable to that of ceo, except that it is even more limited. The Early Irish form of this word is mlas, with which the only connections, cf. LEIA (: M-56) would appear to be Slavic forms, cf. Rus. molsātī ‘suck’, Czech mlsati ‘taste’.

5.2. gráinne: this form is cited in the sense of ‘none’ by McKenna (1935: 45) with reference, it would seem, to solid foodstuffs such as tea. The corresponding Scottish Gaelic form gràine is widely used in a generalised sense of ‘a tiny amount, a few’, negative ‘not a pick’, cf. Wentworth (2003: 74) cha robh gràine ri fhaighinn ‘there wasn’t a bit to be had’. The Early Irish form gráinde ‘cereal-grain’, cf. Kelly (2000: 560-1) constitutes a singulative form of grán, itself a borrowing from Lat. grānum.

5.3.1. greim: de Bhaldraithe (1959: 480) cites this word with the meaning of ‘not (eating) a bite’. The word is, of course, common in Ireland and Scotland in the sense of a ‘bite’. For the Early Irish is greim(m) with the basic sense of a ‘hold, grip’, cf. perhaps Goth. greipan, ON grípa, Buck (1949: 744-7).

5.3.2. smailc: this is recorded by McKenna (1935: 893) for Munster in the sense of nothing being ar ‘on’, i.e. wrong with, someone (cf. 2.3.2). The same source also notes the use of ceo (3.2) in this sense. The basic sense of the word is a ‘bite, mouthful’, for it has also been recorded in use in a N. Connacht dialect<sup>6</sup> signifying ‘nothing’ with reference to eating, while in a neighbouring dialect of English, cf. Ó Muirthe (1996: 181) the verb smailc signifies to ‘eat voraciously’. This verb can also be used in the latter dialect, as in dialects of Irish, in the sense of to ‘smack’, as of children, a connection which brings into question the possibility of its being an English loanword in origin. McKenna also gives an expanded version, namely smailc ná smáil, the final word here, standard smál. Early Irish smál, smól, whose etymology is unclear, appears to have a primary sense of ‘fire, blaze’ cf. LEIA (: S-140).

5.4. deoir: McKenna cites this word (1935: 45, deor) for Connacht and Munster as signifying ‘none’ with reference to drinking, which, of course, parallels the use of greim (v 5.3.1) to signify the smallest amount possible of solid food. The Early Irish form is dér ‘tear, drop’, for which a common origin is cited, cf. LEIA (: D-54-5) with Goth. tagr ‘tear’ etc.

<sup>6</sup> Informant of Prof. Séamas Ó Catháin’s.

6.0. The last group is somewhat heterogeneous in nature, but most items are connected with human activities, perceptions or the like.

6.1. cáil: this is a term which may be categorised here. It is recorded in north-eastern Irish dialects with the meaning of 'quantity, amount', while in Scotland, either alone or qualified by sam bith, it generally has the signification under discussion here, namely 'any, none'. Ó Baoill (1978: 177-78) points out that a rare instance of its use in this sense has been noted in Ulster, while an 18th century Scottish poet employs the word with the meaning commonly known in Ulster. In regard to its derivation, as noted by the same scholar, the meaning 'quantity, amount' appears to have developed at a comparatively late stage, while the primary sense would appear to be that of 'quality, characteristic'. It has, indeed, been suggested, LEIA (: C-10), that the word in question may, in fact, be a loan-word, deriving ultimately from Lat. qualitas, and, in this connection, it is noteworthy that one Ulster point in LASID does in fact supply an instance of a cháiliocht as a secondary response with the meaning of 'any', cf. 1.3 in this connection where the use of cineál 'type, kind', in a LASID response from western Ireland is noted as signifying 'anything, nothing'.

6.2. cruthaitheachd: this is another term used to mean 'anything, nothing', which is recorded for a single point among the LASID data for Scotland. The basic sense is 'creation, creativity', hence 'activity' and the context of the atlas question is, appropriately enough, 'doing'. The substantive in question is based on Early Irish cruth, for which LEIA (: C-256-7) proposes an IE root **k<sup>v</sup>er-* 'to make, shape', cf. Sk. karōti, 'makes, accomplishes', Lith. kùrti 'makes, builds'.

6.3. tarbha: (standard form tairbhe) may also be considered here. This is a form noted by me from an eastern mainland Scottish dialect. The basic meaning is 'profit, advantage' and its use in the expression in question may have derived from such idiomatic and proverbial usages as nithe gun tairbhe 'things without profit', or an t-ainm gun an tairbhe 'the name or credit (of anything) without the profit' (i.e. benefit of it), Dwelly (1977: 925). In the expression under discussion tarbha may be qualified by the adverb idir 'at all' (historically the 3 sg. m. pronominal form of the preposition idir 'between', thus 'between, i.e. within, it', cf. modern idioms involving the equivalent form of de 'of it', cf. Wentworth (2003: 525 s.v. nothing but). Modern tarbha is a reflex of Middle Irish tarba, cf. Early Irish torbe, which itself derives from a verbal complex such as **to-for-ben* 'to profit', originally involving a form of the substantive verb.

6.4.1. faic(e): a major item for consideration in this section is one which has a number of LASID entries throughout the south and west of Ireland (Munster and Connacht) respectively. In the former province it is listed in 14 separate entries, while in the latter it appears 5 times. In Munster it may be qualified by in aon chor

‘at all’, lit. ‘in any condition’, and there are two Connacht examples of a form in final -e, which probably derives from an oblique case form. Though not so qualified in the LASID examples, faic, as is well known, can also be qualified through the addition of the substantive phrase na fríde (see above 2.6). The historical corpus of Irish, CG, (1600-1882), documents no instances of faic(e) before the late 17th century which makes likely the suggestion that the word is a loan-word derived from English whack. Although its use in expressions of the type under consideration is not restricted to phrases involving ‘doing, making’, its origin in the idea of a ‘blow’ or ‘stroke’ would be similar to the familiar phrase stróic oibre ‘a stroke of work’, cf. Ó Dónaill (1977: 1173) in which the first term is a borrowing from English stroke). This phrase is common in modern colloquial Irish. The following item also should be considered in the same semantic range.

6.4.2. tap: this term, which is clearly from English tap, has been recorded in a N. Connacht<sup>7</sup> dialect with reference to ‘doing’. It would seem likely that its entry into Irish was based on a familiarity with the English expression ‘not (doing) a tap (of work)’.

6.4.3. car: this word is recorded in the sense of ‘nothing’ in the context of ‘doing’ in Scottish Gaelic, cf. Dwelly (1977: 167) cha robh car air an t-saoghal ‘there was nothing at all’, lit. ‘in the world’, cf. air/ sam bith (v. 1.1.1), although it does not feature in LASID. In the modern language it signifies, among other things, a ‘turn, spell of work’, cf. gabh car! ‘take a turn!’. The corresponding Middle Irish form is cor ‘state, condition’, which is to be referred to the verb cuir ‘put’, Early Irish stem cuir-. To the same IE root from which the latter may derive have been compared forms such as Gk σκαίρω ‘dance’, OSl. skorŭ ‘fast’. Cor is, of course, the word which appears in the qualifying adverbial expressions already referred to meaning ‘at all’ which are noted above at various points, namely ar chor bith, and in aon chor. However, the Scottish expression here discussed does not appear in Irish sources and relates firmly to the notion of a ‘turn of work’ in the latter language.

6.5.1. fionna-feanna: one most interesting instance to be included in this category is again obtained from Lane (1922: 1089) and McKenna (1935: 893). The latter, who provides most information, cites it for Connacht in two senses: (i) ‘not to leave a bit’; and (ii) ‘not to have (a tap) of work to do’. Lane quotes the second sense with the fuller spelling fionnadh feannadh. The second word here is clearly the verbal noun of feann ‘to skin, flay’ preceded by the related noun fionnadh ‘fur’, cf. the common English idiom ‘to be skint’. Both are connected via the notion of ‘perception’, hence ‘surface [appearance]’, to Early Irish fiss ‘knowledge’, cf. Lat video, Gk ἰδεῖν McKenna also provides a variant fionnafeanc, where the latter element would have been influenced by faic(e) (v. 6.4.1).

<sup>7</sup> Information supplied by Prof. Ó Catháin.

6.5.2. fol: this term, also found in McKenna (1935: 893), is noted by him for Munster where this word, signifying '(head of) hair', is employed in expressions signifying 'anything, nothing'. This usage clearly lies within the same semantic range as the preceding, since fionnadh may also refer to human hair. According to MacBain (1982: 162), Early Irish fol is to be connected to Lat. vellus 'fleece' lāna 'wool', etc.

Fig. 1 Part of Ireland, Man & W. Scotland

APPENDIX 1

Items from LASID containing terms ‘anything, nothing’

34	I would not chew tobacco if I got it for nothing.
74b	We don't need anything.
279	We do not get (any money).
280	He would not get (anything).
281	He did not get (anything).
305	I shall eat whatever you will give me.
306	I didn't eat anything today because I was sick.
965	I know nothing about him.
996	He does nothing at all.
1008	Nothing is troubling him.
1027	He didn't say (anything).
1028	Did he say (anything)?
1040	I didn't do anything

REFERENCES

- Buck, C. D., 1949, A dictionary of selected synonyms in the principal Indo-European languages, Chicago.
- CG: Ú.M. Uí Bheirn (ed.), 2004, [CD-ROM] Corpas na Gaeilge 1600-1882/ The Irish language corpus, Dublin.
- de Bhaldraithe, T., 1959, English-Irish dictionary, Dublin.
- DEL: E. Ernout, A. Meillet (1951, 3rd ed.), Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue latine, Paris.
- DIL, 1913-76, Royal Irish Academy. (Contributions to a Dictionary of the Irish language, Dublin.
- Dinneen, P.S., S.J., 1927, Foclóir Gaedhilge agus Béarla: an Irish-English dictionary, Dublin.
- Dorian, N.C., 1978, East Sutherland Gaelic: the dialect of Brora, Golspie, and Embo fishing communities, Dublin.
- Dwelly, E., 1977, 9th edition, The illustrated Gaelic-English dictionary, Glasgow.
- Kelly, F., 2000, Early Irish farming, Dublin.
- Lane, T. O'N., 1922, Larger English-Irish dictionary, Dublin.
- LASID, 1958-66, H. H. Wagner, Linguistic atlas and survey of Irish dialects. vols 1-3, Dublin; (1969) Wagner, H. H. and Ó Baoill, C. vol. 4. Dublin.
- LEIA: J. Vendryes, E. Bachellery, P.-Y. Lambert, (eds.), 1959-96, Lexique étymologique de l'irlandais ancien, Dublin and Paris.
- Lewis, H., H. Pedersen (eds.), 1961, A Comparative Celtic grammar, Göttingen.
- MacBain, A., 1911 revised edition, reprinted 1982, An etymological dictionary of the Gaelic language, Glasgow.
- McCone, K. et al (eds), 1994, Stair na Gaeilge Maigh Nuad.
- McKenna, L., S.J., 1935, Foclóir Béarla agus Gaedhilge, Dublin.
- Ó Baoill, C., 1978, Contributions to a comparative study of Ulster Irish and Scottish Gaelic, Belfast.
- Ó Cuív, B., 1944, The Irish of west Muskerry, Co. Cork, Dublin.
- Ó Dónaill, N., 1977, Foclóir Gaeilge-Béarla, [Dublin], Báile Átha Cliath.
- Ó Muirithe, D., 1996, A dictionary of Anglo-Irish: words and phrases from Gaelic in the English of Ireland, Dublin.
- Ó Murchú, M., 1989, East Perthshire Gaelic: social history, phonology, texts and lexicon, Dublin.
- O'Rahilly, T. F., 1972, ed. by Ó Cuív, B., Irish dialects past and present, Dublin.

- SND*: W. Grant, D. D. Murison (eds.), 1956, vol. 4; 1974, vol. 9. The Scottish national dictionary. Edinburgh.
- Thurneysen, R., 1961, revised ed., Grammar of Old Irish, Dublin.
- Wagner, H. H., 1959, Gaeilge Theilinn, [Dublin], Baile Áthe Cliath.
- Watson, S., 1984, "Séamus Ó Duillearga's Antrim Notebooks", Zeitschrift für celtische Philologie, 40, 74–117.
- Watson, S., 1997, "Aspects of the adaptation of loan-words in Gaelic", Zeitschrift für Dialektologie und Linguistik, 97, 428–37.
- Watson, S., 2000, "The personal numeral category in the Goidelic branch of Celtic", Dialectologia et Geolinguistica, 8, 69–80.
- Watson, S., 2002, "Uimhreacha pearsanta sa Ghaeilge", in: P. Ó hÉalaí, M. Ó Briain (eds.), Téada dúchais: aistí in ómós don Ollamh Breandán Ó Madagáin, Conamara, 549–564.
- Wentworth, R., 2003, Gaelic words and phrases from Wester Ross/ Faclan is abairtean à Ros an Iar, Inverness.