

FRIGHTENED WOMEN IN ODYSSEY

Ioana Costa

Prof., PhD., University of Bucharest, “G. Călinescu” Institute of Literary History and Theory

Abstract: Fear is frequently illustrated in Odyssey, both as male and female response to threatening acts or situations. A restrained search of the related passages in the first half of the poem highlights both the Homeric specific approach of the fear and the linguistic equivalence in the corpus of the major Romanian translations, especially the 1929 edition of Cezar Papacostea (Odyssey I-XII, original metre).

Keywords: Homer, Odyssey, translation, fear, female characters

The Homeric fear is strong, vigorous, even if not to be defined as strictly virile. More than that, the fear experienced by the male heroes themselves might be perceived as a sign of weakness, as symptoms of a feminine behaviour. We intend to exemplify here the frightened reactions of some female characters in exclusively a part of the Homeric corpus, id est the first half of the Odyssey. This selection is meant to draw attention to the major translations of this Homeric epic poem into Romanian, including an undeservedly forgotten version from the first third of the 20th century, belonging to Cezar Papacostea (1929, books I to XII).

The Romanian translations of the Homeric Odyssey are both numerous and dissimilar, not only as lexical options (which is to be expected when created by different scholars), but also as general approach: prose or verse, in iambic hendecasyllables, rhymed octaves, hexameters.

Remaining within the margins of the 20th century, there are no less than five outstanding translations, which hardly might be listed in a chronological order. The difficulty is due to the gap between the work of the translator and its editorial accomplishment that sometimes occurred only several decades after. As the translations become valid solely when circulated, in a large perspective (both cultural and editorial), the chronology of the Romanian Odyssey-s is the rigid chronology of their editions. The milestones of this enterprise are the editiones principes of the five versions: in 1924 is published the translation in iambic hendecasyllables of George Murnu (some fragments were previously published in 1906, in original metre), revised by its author in 1940; in 1935 is published the prose version of Eugen Lovinescu, initiated around 1917; the rhymed iambic octaves of George Coşbuc was published in 1966 (the poet was still working on it just before his death, in 1918); the series of the complete Odyssey-s ends with the Odyssey of Dan Slușanschi, published in 1997 (reprinted in 2009, Publishing House “Paideia”), revised in 2012 (Publishing House “Humanitas”). Among these translations is to be noticed the half-Odyssey translated by Cezar Papacostea (1929), preceded by fragments published in periodicals, beginning with 1910, as the first extended attempt to use the hexametric dactyls. This Odyssey remained for about seventy years a singular endeavour to assume the dactylic rhythm for the Romanian version of the ordeals the king of Ithaca encountered when returning from Troy.

The translations were (besides several reprints) edited and reedited in philologically significant conditions. We add here some notes, in a non-chronological order, subjectively following their impact.

1. Published some fifty years after the death of its author, the translation accomplished by George Coșbuc (in rhymed octaves, following the pattern ABABABCC), was edited by I. Sfetea and Ștefan Cazimir. The preface, written by Ștefan Cazimir, is followed by a “Note on the edition” that explains the editorial fate of this translation: it was in course of being printed by the Publishing House “Casa Școalelor” when Coșbuc died, leaving the final variant unaccomplished. The editors of the 1966 Odyssey, published by “Editura pentru literatură”, attempted to offer a text as faithful as possible regarding the final desire of the Romanian poet (p. XXIII), working on the manuscript deposited at the Academy Library in 1941 (nr. 2924-2929). The editors compared this manuscript (corresponding to the 24 books of Odyssey) with: another manuscript, of the ninth book, deposited at the Academy Library in 1955 (nr. 3295); the typographical sheets of the Publishing House “Casa Școalelor” (the first eight books and the beginning of the ninth, stanzas 1 to 54), property of I. Sfetea; a galley proof of the tenth book displaying the corrections made by Coșbuc up to the 69th stanza (Academy Library, “Coșbuc” documents); a fragment (stanzas 70 to 85), with the Coșbuc’s manu propria corrections. For the fragments that were missing in this translation, the two editors inserted, in final notes, the corresponding passages taken from the prose translation accomplished by Eugen Lovinescu; they do not stipulate the edition they used, but is certainly the 1955 one.

2. The Eugen Lovinescu’s translation was published, in a first edition, in 1935, being followed in 1936 by a second and, a decade after, by a third edition (1946), posthumously published. The text was edited by Traian Costa in 1955 (“Editura Tineretului”), 1963 (“Editura pentru literatură”) and 1966 (“Editura Tineretului”). These new editions (with notes, commentaries and index nominum) brought some novelties: a slight remodelling of the Romanian version and the corresponding Greek variants of the proper names that Lovinescu used in Latin form, in the current traditional manner, e.g. Iupiter (actually, in Lovinescu’s option, Jupiter), Neptun, Minerva, for Zeus, Poseidon, Atena. The series of reediting Lovinescu’s translation included the celebratory moment of reprinting the 1936 edition (Publishing Houses “Saeculum I.O” and “Vestala”), in 1995, with a postface by Traian Diaconescu.

3. The Odiseea of George Murnu clearly dominated for a long time the corpus of Romanian Odyssey-s, as part of the first complete translation of the Homeric poems. Giving up the dactylic hexameter he used in Iliad and in the first attempts to translate Odyssey, previous to the year 1906, George Murnu adopted the iambic hendecasyllables (in catalectic variant). In the 1956 edition (Publishing House “Editura de stat pentru literatură și artă”), Dionisie M. Pippidi, the author of the introductory study and of the commentaries, expressed his astonishment for the fortune of this text: „vreme de treizeci de ani traducerea Murnu n-a cunoscut un răsunet pe măsura Iliadei traduse de același cărturar, în ciuda indiscutabilelor ei calități și în ciuda împrejurării că – pînă în acest moment (id est, 1956) e unica versiune românească în versuri completă. Faptul de a fi adoptat endecasilabul, renunțînd la hexametru, nu constituie desigur o explicație, dat fiind că tocmai preferința acordată unui vers familiar cititorului modern a fost salutată de mulți ca un exemplu vrednic de urmat și ca o realizare marcînd izbînda literară cea mai valabilă a traducătorului” (note 1, p. 26). The 1956 edition was followed by the “definitive edition” (Publishing House “Univers”, 1971), published by D.M. Pippidi, who included the changes George Murnu made during his last years of life. By the end of the ’70, the Publishing House “Univers” offered a new edition, with an introductory study and notes by Adrian Pîrvulescu.

4. The final years of the 20th century brought a new Romanian variant of both the Homeric poems, accomplished by Dan Slușanschi. The major change comes precisely from the Odyssey translation, which the translator decided to transpose in original metre, keeping a strict equivalence line to line with the Greek poem. Unlike the Murnu enterprise, this editorial project begins with Odyssey (1997), followed without delay by Iliad (1998). Both volumes were published by the Publishing House “Paideia”, and were posthumously reprinted in 2009. The gigantic project of professor Slușanschi meant to embrace, in spe, the two volumes within a series of the three major ancient (Greek and Latin) poems in bilingual editions. In 2000 were published the volumes Eneida and Aeneis: the translation of Vergil’s poem (in dactylic hexameter, again in equivalence line to line with the Greek text) and the critical edition of the Latin text. A similar critical edition was supposed to conclude the Homeric volumes, together with separate volumes of commentaries. This project remained – sic dis placuit – unaccomplished. The two existing Homeric volumes were reedited in 2012 (Publishing House “Humanitas”), with the necessary correction of previous typographical errors and the insertion of the missing passages, using the documents (mostly manuscripts et similia) hosted by the “Dan Slușanschi section” of the New Europe College library; there were only four lines that needed a new translation, made by Francisca Băltăceanu: 4.132-133, 6.200, 19.59.

5. Unlike all the others, the Odyssey of Cezar Papacostea was only republished without changes in 1946; we edited it in 2013 (“Muzeul Literaturii Române” Publishing House). His Odyssey ends with the 12th book; we have to acknowledge nevertheless that this half-Odyssey is to be considered imperfect, unaccomplished, only in an etymological sense of the term (as being unfinished): it is actually perfect in each and every line and “rhapsody” of the twelve books this remarkable translation contains. The specific melody of this text belongs not only to the seemingly unfamiliar rhythms, but also to the natural transposition of the Homeric story into the world of the Romanian fairytales: the goddesses are fairies, the kings are “crai”, the ethic dative appears to be not only facile solutions to the hexameter necessities, but totally justifiable, inviting the reader to enter a story that seemed familiar.

Coming back to the “fear” topic in Homeric Odyssey (and keeping strictly within the margins of the first twelve books, in the Romanian translation of Cezar Papacostea), we might attempt an assessment of both male and female symptoms of fear.

Odysseus faces numerous frightful moments, nearly as many as his intense and abundant adventures. Some of them are natural, justifiable; some others are with no solid basis, generated solely by the mistrust he used to encounter even the most benevolent gestures. Belongs to this last compartment the way he responds when Calypso set him free and promised him even consistent help for leaving the OgygiaIsland. After seven years of being kept against his will, Odysseus had good reasons to suspect the proposal, which came all of sudden. The nymph, “zîna zînelor” (“the fairy of the fairies”) in Papacostea’s translation, was herself compelled to act against her will, in order to submit to the decision of the Olympian gods, brought to her island by their messenger, Hermes. Calypso tried to resist it while she answered Hermes, rapidly passing from indignation against the maliciousness of the gods, who were jealous of other’s happiness (5.117), exemplifying some similar famous mythical episodes (5.118-119) that put her among some other goddesses who loved mortals (5.120,124-125), to a plea for her right to keep Odysseus for herself, as she – unaided – saved the endangered life of the shipwrecked sailor (5.128), highlighting the inconsistent plan of the Olympian gods, who want to release now a human that was meant to perish (5.129-130), and her devotion toward the unhappy prisoner. She finally resigns herself, given the implacable will of the god that all feared, Zeus (5.133-134) – and Calypso knows well this fear, which becomes the ultimate argument to compel her to renounce love. The nymph has one more slight attempt to keep Odysseus for herself, admitting that she is unable to send him home safely (5.139-140), and concludes with words of a woman in love, worried for the outcome of the adored (5.141-142). The mistrust Odysseus expresses in the next lines is even more prominent in contrast with her tender words, traversed by admiration for a man that is suspicious toward the benevolence of the gods. When Calypso unexpectedly is pronouncing the long-desired words “you are free to go” (5.159), Odysseus responds in a manner that might be reasonable only confronted with the changing moods of the gods who tormented him for long years: he is frightened (5.169). The two characters have a short but intense dialogue: Odysseus concisely states that he is being set up by the nymph (5.171), knowing the dangers hidden by the sea, huge threats even for those that are favoured by the gods, as well knows this hero chased and oppressed by Poseidon (5.173-174). He is ready to leave the island only for a fair fight with the sea, with no devious divine plans: he needs Calypso to swear the great oath, on Styx (5.175-177). This is the only guarantee he takes, the unique way to lose his fear.

This is an episode of a doubtful fear, justified by the long endured ordeal of the hero, but with no reason in the factual situation; all the other fears he encounters are less intense, being predictable, natural and simply human. The brutal fear he experienced in the cave of Polyphemus, or in close proximity to Scylla, or during the huge tempests on the sea, even the panic of Euriloch who, abruptly awoken, falls from the roof of Circe’s house, the terror of the mortal that visits the realm of the dead – all these are totally human frights. The image of the sacrifice that god did not want to accept, on the Island of Apollo (12.395-396) – with the ox-hides that crawled about and the raw meat that bellowed – is probably the apogee of the terrifying episodes in his too long journey, mostly as being a warning for his companions that were never to see their island again: the dark omen is understood only by the hero, whose fear is multiplied by the feeling of being helpless.

The women are not supposed to face perils in some foreign and strange lands or sailing on dangerous waters. They remain at home, but are nevertheless exposed to fear. In a certain sense, their feelings are even more intense, being multiplied by the worries regarding not themselves, but the loved ones. Is highly emblematic the response of Penelope when she finds out about the deadly danger that menaced her son. Exhausted by edgily awaiting for her husband, surrounded by suitors, attempting to manage a household where nothing seemed to be normal any longer, she hardly noticed that her son was restless himself, given both the real facts and his own age, on the verge between adolescence and maturity, ready to assume the responsibility of a man, protecting his mother and, all at once, reproving her. Penelope seems to accept the change, but everything is still evolving, nothing is settled yet. Finding out from Medon that the suitors were about to trap and kill Telemach (4.689-691), she simultaneously discovers that his son has left the house, trying to get some news about his father. Penelope’s response displays the whole range of feelings a wounded mother could experience: her heart is ripped („înima ei [...] în două-i se taie”, 4.694), her knees are no longer sustaining her („genunchii în două-i se taie”, 4.694), her voice is gone („Mută-a rămas îndelung” 4.695), she has tears in her eyes („ochii se umplu de lacrimi”, 4.695), the sights hold back her words („Glasul îi e năbușit de suspinuri”, 4.696). She needs time to recover her strength – and does it indeed, like a perfectly rational person, asking precise questions, interrupted by laments, but carried on with great power: why did he leave? This is the source of her pain, but also the source of evaluating the situation, as the perils seem to be much higher than the hypothetical achievement („Spune-mi de ce a plecat și fecioru-mi acuma?/ Ce trebuință era să se ducă pe luntrea cea iute,/ Luntrea... calul de apă cu care-omenirea străbate/ Nesfârșitele umede drumuri în spatele mării?”, 4.698-701). Her fear is justified and multiplied, as the long years of awaiting her husband are now deepening, having her both loved ones far away. Her pain is ripping („Sfîșietoare durere cuprinde pe Penelopeia”, 4. 708) and her acts are matching her torment: she does not sit on a chair (4.709), but throws herself on the ground, actually exactly on the threshold of her wedding chamber („se trîntește pe pragul din ușa odăii de nuntă”, v. 4.710), and her fall is accompanied by tears, echoed by her maids („Și izbucnește în plîns... iar în juru-i femeile toate/ Tinere și mai bătrîne-ncepură să plîngă cu dînsa”, 4.711-712). Her old nurse is comforting her, feeling guilty for not telling in due time the secret of Telemach („Scumpa mea nimfă! Ucide-mă-ndată cu groaznica lance/ Ori mă mai lasă-n viață, dar nu pot să tac mai departe./ Toate știutu-le-am eu, și din toate i-am dat pentru cale./ Tot ce-mi ceruse: și vinuri gustoase și multe merinde./ El îns-atuncea m-a pus ca să-i jur jurământul cel mare/ Cum că tu nu vei afla înainte de dou'spre'ce zile./ Făr'numai dacă-ntrebînd n-ai afla de la altul aceasta...”, 4.735-741). The remedy of pain, in Homeric times, is somehow familiar to us: a relaxing bath and new cloths („du-te mai bine fă baie și ia-ți alte haine”, 4.743), nevertheless a warm prayer („Roagă-te-Atenei, fecioarei fulgerătorului Zeus./ Numai aceasta e-n stare să-l scape din ghearele morții”, 4.745-746). The advice was good for Penelope, who regains strength and is able to return to the palace, renouncing the solitude that previously seemed the only remedy („Astfel zicea și pe dată-și uita de durere regina./ Merg de face o baie, și-mbracă mai bune veșminte./ Apoi se suie-n palat însoțită de slugile toate”, 4.752-753).

The tears are not unusual for Odysseus himself: are actually abundant in the Phaeacian episode when, finding refuge from the sea perils and all his ordeals, is listening to the songs of Demodocus: the Homeric enlarged comparison is explicitly made in feminine context („Biruitoare Odysseus, ajutîndu-l și Pallas Atena./ Astea cînta renumitul aed... Odysseus se topise;/ Lacrimi șiroaie-i curgeau umezindu-i obrajii cei rumeni./ Cum își jelește femeia bărbatul ce-i este în floare/ Cînd el se luptă să-și apere patria sa și copiii;/ Cum ea s-aruncă pe dînsul de-l vede că-i gata să cadă/ Sub lovituri înaintea orașului său și armatei./ Crîncenă luptă luptînd ca să-i scape de-o zi nemiloasă;/ Cum ea, văzînd că se zbugiumă-n ghearele morții grozave./ Cade pe el și-l bocește duios, iar dușmanul în spate/ Dă lovituri și la ceafă și-n umeri, și-l duce-n robie./ Chinul și nenorocirea-așteptîndu-i de-acuma în viață;/ Cum s-ofilesc apoi jalnic de plîns obrăjorii cei tineri./ Astfel vărsa Odysseus din gene șiroaie de lacrimi.” 8.526-538). The female character of this comparison is presumably meant to counterbalance the strength of Nausikaa who, alone among her maids, is fearless at the sight of the tormented shipwrecked sailor („Numai copila lui Alkinoos a stat îndrăzneată/ (Căci îi sădise în suflet curajul Atena ea însăși,/ Și-i izgoni din toată ființa sămînța de teamă)/ Singură-îi stete în față...”, 6.145-148).

Odysseus is weeping, the nymph Calypso only fears the supreme god that all feared, Nausikaa is fearless, Penelope is torn apart, but regains her balance with majestic dignity: the feminine face of fear in Odyssey is not fundamentally different from the male one. It is a simply human fear or, not unlikely, the fear understood by a poet, a male poet.

BIBLIOGRAPHY¹

George Murnu

Odisea. [București], Cultura Națională, s.a. [1924].

Odisea. București, Cugetarea - Georgescu Delafras, s.a. [1940].

Odiseea. Studiu introductiv și comentarii de D. M. Pippidi, București, Editura de stat pentru literatură și artă, 1956.

Odiseea. Studiu introductiv și note de D. M. Pippidi. Ediție definitivă. București, Editura Univers, 1971.

Odiseea. Studiu introductiv și note de Adrian Pîrvulescu, București, Editura Univers, 1979.

Cezar Papacostea. Cărțile I-XII

Odysseia. București, Cartea Românească, 1929.

¹ This is the corpus of the Romanian translations mentioned in the paper, presented chronologically (in respect of the year the first edition was published), in five compartments, corresponding to the five major translators of the 20th century editions. We preserved the original titles of each edition.

Odysseia. [București], Casa Școalelor, s.a. [1944].

Odysseia I-XII (1929). Introducere, notă asupra ediției, note și indice de Ioana Costa, București, Editura Muzeul Literaturii Române, 2013.

Eugen Lovinescu

Odissea. București, Fundația pentru literatură și artă „Regele Carol II”, 1935.

Odissea. Ediția a doua, București, Fundația pentru literatură și artă „Regele Carol II”, 1936.

Odisseia. Ediția a treia, București, Fundația pentru literatură și artă „Regele Carol II”, 1946.

Odisseia. [București], Editura Tineretului [revizuită de Traian Costa], 1955.

Odissea. Text revăzut și note de Traian Costa. Studiu introductiv și indice de Mihail Nasta, [București], Editura pentru literatură, 1963.

Odissea. Text revăzut și note de Traian Costa. Prefață de Venera Antonescu. 2 volume (cărțile I-XII; XIII-XXIV), [București], Editura Tineretului, s.a. [1966].

Odissea. Postfață de Traian Diaconescu, București, Editura Saeculum I.O. – Editura Vestala, 1995.

George Coșbuc

Odissea. Ediție îngrijită de I. Sfetea și Șt. Cazimir, prefață de Șt. Cazimir, București, Editura pentru literatură, 2 volume (cărțile I-XII; XIII-XXIV), 1966.

Dan Slușanschi

Odysseia. București, Editura Paideia, 1998.

Odysseia. Ediția a doua, București, Editura Paideia, 2009.

Odysseia. Tradusă în hexametri, cu o postfață, bibliografie și indici de Dan Slușanschi și ilustrată de Alexandru Rădvan [revizuirii și completări de Francisca Băltăceanu și Octavian Gordon], București, Editura Humanitas, 2012.