TRADITIONAL CUSTOMS:
RUSALII¹ HOLIDAY AND CĂLUȘ DANCE IN OLTENIA

Abstract: The Roman influence can be traced in many popular customs and traditions in Oltenia de sub Munte². The passing of time has often changed their pattern, adapted their historical present, but it has never changed their essence, and here we refer to that Latin DAN that has always complemented our origin, creating the base of our formation as a people, as natio. Preserved over the centuries, wearing Christian attire, several popular holidays, marked both in the religious and the popular calendars, maintain their importance in the collective consciousness of the Romanians, both in rural and urban areas. For instance, Rusalii, an important Christian feast, most observed in its popular version unrelated to the Descent of the Holy Spirit, was declared “public holiday” two years ago. The first two days of Rusalii are non-working days. Definitely, it was the importance of the Christian event that mattered for this decision, but the Romanians, especially those in rural areas, actually do not work these nine sacred days in the popular calendar, for fear of vindictive deities of the sky. Closely related to Rusalii, as the sole method of exorcism and cure of the evil caused by Zâne, Mânioase, Iele, Frumoase³, in Oltenia de sub Munte one can find the magical dance of Călușarii, simply known as Căluș. It is interesting to note that while Căluș dance has been preserved especially by the artistic representation and its original purpose of cure and comfort has almost disappeared, the Rusalii, and here we refer strictly to the popular version of the feast, have maintained almost intact their functions: the restrictions imposed by them must be observed religiously, otherwise the unfaithful will be afflicted by great trouble. These unpredictable and evil deities “hit” and “cripple” the luckless ones who dare to come out their way the summer nights. The hearts of the Romanians are ingrained with this ancestral fear.

Key words: Rusalii, Călușari, popular holiday.

The Roman influence can be traced in many popular customs and traditions in Oltenia de sub Munte⁴. The passing of time has often changed their pattern, adapted their historical present, but it has never changed their essence, and here we refer to that Latin DAN that has always complemented our origin, creating the base of our formation as a people, as natio.

Preserved over the centuries, wearing Christian attire, several popular holidays, marked both in the religious and the popular calendars, maintain their importance in the collective consciousness of the Romanians, both in rural and urban areas. For instance, Rusalii, an important Christian feast, most observed in its popular version unrelated to the Descent of the Holy Spirit, was declared “public holiday” two years ago. The first two days of Rusalii are non-working days. Definitely, it was the importance of the Christian event that mattered for this decision, but the Romanians, especially those in rural areas, actually do not work these nine sacred days in the popular calendar, for fear of vindictive deities of the sky. Closely related to Rusalii, as the sole method of exorcism and cure of the evil caused by *Zâne, Mânioase, Iele, Frumoase*¹, in Oltenia de sub Munte one can find the magical dance of Călușarii, simply known as Căluș. It is interesting to note that while Căluș dance has been preserved especially by the artistic representation and its original purpose of cure and comfort has almost disappeared, the Rusalii, and here we refer strictly to the popular version of the feast, have maintained almost intact their functions: the restrictions imposed by them must be observed religiously, otherwise the unfaithful will be afflicted by great trouble. These unpredictable and evil deities "hit" and "cripple" the luckless ones who dare to come out their way the summer nights. The hearts of the Romanians are ingrained with this ancestral fear.

"Ielele are feminine mythical representations that come out at night, before cock-crow, between Easter and Rusalii. There is a zonal synonymy in their names: *Cele Sfinte*², *Dânsele*³, *Fetele Câmpului*⁴, *Frumoasele*⁵, *Măiestrele*⁶, Rusaliile, *Șoimanele*⁷, *Ursoaicele*⁸, *Zânele*⁹ and others. They are rebel spirits of the dead who, after having spent Easter together with the living, refuse to return to their underground places. Unlike the ghosts that appear and cause trouble to people during the cold season of the year, Ielele populate the Romanian mythical landscape in summertime only. They have an anthropomorphic look: virgins dressed in white, in odd numbers, only rarely in even numbers." In Oltenia de sub Munte, in the consciousness of people, they are known as Rusalii, nine days from the eve of the feast itself, while the rest of the summer, in June, July and part of August, they are called Iele. In June¹⁰ Sânzienele are celebrated as well (June 24). However, they are beneficent agrarian deities "protectresses of wheat fields and married women". (GHINOIU, 2005: 138-139). Sânziana or Drăgaica identified with Diana and Juno in Roman Pantheon or Hera and Artemis in Greek Pantheon, is also the protectress of girls who have reached the marriage age, and it is said that the night she is celebrated (June 23/24) the skies open and love spells are prepared.

Wicked, unpredictable and vengeful, according to the popular belief, Rusaliile must be mellowed with rich alms, on the occasion of *Moșii de vară*¹¹, on the Saturday dedicated to the dead, on the eve of the feast that bears their name. Romulus Vulcanescu in Romanian Mythology defines Ielele as "fairies of sylvan and pastoral space that personify the atmospheric states in continuous motion and change". Regarding the origin of these deities four hypotheses have been outlined: 1. Souls of bewitched women; 2. Daughters of Rusalin Emperor; 3. Three daughters of Alexander Makedon who have been flying around dizzily, looking for the wonder horse of their father, ever since they drank from a bottle the “water of life”¹; 4. Ielele are beautiful girls transformed into ugly girls or vice-versa, punished by *Nefărtat*² for their ugly deeds.

“According to the tradition, the name Iele is only a ritual appellation, a polite euphemism, a taboo, because those who discover their true meaning and pronounce their name, regardless of conditions, are left voiceless and they can hardly gain back their speech. The nominal taboo goes so far with precautions that even when the appellations are known by everybody, they must be forgotten and replaced by others, not to attract punishment from Iele. (...) Ielele in their entirety as well as in their functional groups are assigned several mythical meanings. Generally they are fairies sometimes good, sometimes bad, according to their mood, with immediate interests and other reasons unknown to people” (VULCĂNESCU, 1985: 428-429). When the mortal wants to mellow them, he will use the names that flatter their elation, when he wants to chase them away, he will use the insults and menaces.

At the same time, Rusaliile “is the popular name of the ecclesiastical feast celebrated on the fifth day after Easter, dedicated to the Holy Trinity (the Descent of the Holy Ghost, Trinity)” (EVSEEV, 1998: 403). As already emphasized above, the restrictions imposed by this event (forbiddance of labour no matter its nature, of haste, dance, forbiddance of sleeping outside, of taking water from the well at night, etc.) evoke a conduct modeled according to the supposed commands of the pagan deity, rather than to the norms imposed by the church for these holidays. “The ethnologists and the historians almost unanimously admit the pagan layer of this feast devoted to ancestor worship, hence its name Moșii de Rusalii or *Moșii de vară*³. Etymologically speaking, its Daco-Romanian name, existing almost in the entire Balkan and East-Slavic area, has Latin origin, where Rosalia <rosa “rose”, was a feast dedicated to worshipping the ancestors who died untimely; people used to bring showers and bunches of spring roses to the graves and memorial feasts were organized” (Ibidem). Rosalia was an important feast dedicated to roses and to worshipping the dead. On May 13, according to Ferias, or on May 23 according to Constantine’s calendar, the Romans used to decorate their homes with flowers. This custom is still preserved; not only houses are adorned with flowers, but churches as well. Rosalia was taken over by Christianity and assimilated with the Descent of the Holy Ghost. On our lands, according to Mircea Vulcanescu, Rosalia became a cycle of nine days called Rusalii, and acquired additional meanings in the mythical popular calendar, being a feast devoted not only to worshipping the dead (Moșii de Rusalii is a day of charity and funeral feast) but also dedicated to worshipping the sun in order to obtain rich harvest, protect the waters, the vegetation, and cure neurological diseases. That is why A. Candrea called them Pathogenic Fairies. “According to the magical pathogenesis, Rusaliile carried psychoneurotic diseases, morpheic epilepsy which, in popular belief, were cured by Călușarii. They danced *hora călușului*⁴ around a boulder on the ground, and jumped over it exorcising the fairies of the disease” (VULCĂNESCU, 1985: 320).

The only remedy against the dreadful sufferings that befall the mortals punished by Iele or Rusalii is Călușarii dance or Călușul as it is called in Oltenia and Walachia. The dance has lost its magical properties and only the artistic ones have been preserved, but the story of its origin still raises the interest of specialized researchers. “(...) călușarii is part of a cycle of traditions devoted to solstitial and equinoctial feasts, having the solar horses as theme, in opposition to the infernal horses. Ultimately, what is the mythological relationship between the solar cult and călușarii? A few details: Călușarii tradition opens and closes the days devoted to celebrating Rusalii (Latin Rosalia), one of the oldest and most observed archaic feasts of the Romans, taken over by Christians and assimilated with the Ascension” (VULCĂNESCU, 1985: 320). In Romanian Mythology three theories of Căluș origins are summarized: Latin, Greek and Thracian. In Latin theory there are three hypotheses: the first connects the origin of Călușarii dance to the Roman Salii – a ritual dance show performed by 12 Salii, priests of the god Mars and of the hero Hercules, in April, during the Ides. The ritual dance of the Salii led by Vates, their headman (it is supposed that in Romanian, it became *vătaf*¹) is very similar to Căluș dance. Some linguists consider that the word călușar originate in the word Colissali, the surname of the Salii. The structure of Călușarii group, its hierarchy and the ritual dance, the costumes and the auxiliary artifacts” (VULCĂNESCU, 1985: 377) rebuild, at least imagistically, this ancient Roman rite. The second hypothesis concerns the Sabine origin of the magical dance. Călușarii would be a partial imitation of the allegorical dance symbolizing the abduction of Sabine women by the Romans. But, Vulcanescu argues, “the resemblances emphasized by the supporters of this theory contradict and do not explain the complex structure of the performance of the tradition inherited by the Romanians, where the abduction theme is only an insignificant episode in some versions of the dance”.

The third hypothesis establishes a direct connection between Rosalia and Căluș, “considering Călușarii dancing with weapons as part of the solar cult. This assumption that explains Călușarii as representatives of Ielele, emphasizes certain belated episodes, influenced by a feudal deontology regarding the Romanian Rusalii feast, similar to Slavic Pentecost in some aspects”. Finally, the last Latin theory assumes that Călușarii originate in the name of an ancient sacred membership playing a double part, a group part: Collosium and collosii.

Greek theories are of two kinds. The first one refers to the ritual dance of the Cretan priests dedicated to the orgiastic worship of Great Goddess Rhea. “As members of the chthonian cult, the priests were divided into several groups, according to their semi-martial character.” (VULCĂNESCU, 1985: 377) The last Greek theory refers to the magic dance of the begging priests called Agyrtai, a cult dedicated to the goddess Demeter. Similarly to Călușul, the dancers were bound by strict vows.

According to Romulus Vulcanescu, the Thracian theories bring in the most plausible explanation. Nevertheless, this theory does not necessarily contradict the Roman one, from the perspective of an empire that molded the entire area in terms of military forces, culture and religion. The first hypothesis refers to the Thracian martial dance performed by Cabiri or Dioscuri, dedicated to the semi-deity Pyrrha, the fairy of the reddish land of which Zeus made the people. The second hypothesis assumes that

Călușarii originate in Kolabrisimos, “a Thracian solar solstitial dance, with ritual ludic, medical, martial and purgatorial implications. The traditional dance was performed in circles, in round dances imitating the passing of the sun in the sky at summer solstice. It began at sunrise and ended at sunset. Only men participated in Kolabrisimos. In their ritual dance, men used to carry mascoid staffs symbolizing the solar rays, which afterwards turned into ritual horse mascoids” (VULCĂNESCU, 1985: 378).

Other researchers of this fascinating ritual dance suggested other theories as well. H.B. Oprisan advanced the theory according to which Călușarii is a tradition of Roman descent, but with Dacian influences. Ovidiu Birlea considers that in Călușarii dance “two main representations are merging: one connected to the worship of Iele and the other connected to the caballine cult, to the “totemic cult of horse” respectively. At the same time, Mircea Eliade believes that Călușarii dance is a Geto-Dacian ritual for initiating young men. Beyond these theories and hypotheses, the direct connection between Rusalii, as pre-Christian feast and Călușarii is clearly highlighted. Both of them celebrate the beginning of summer and the victory of sun. In the war between Călușarii and Rusalii the confrontation between the good and the evil can also be noted. Not only that Călușarii can cure the people deformed by the evil fairies but also “they can hasten the marriage of girls at Rusalii and fertilize the sterile women by taking them into the circle dance and touching them with the wooden phallus carried by Mut” (GHINOIU, 2005: 132). Ion Ghinoiu believes that Căluș is a caballine god of Indo-European descent, protector of horses and of the warm season of the year that dies and is born on Rusalii. The influence of the church pushed the pre-Christian script out of the Paschal cycle, originally the script of Căluș taking place during foaling and mating (GHINOIU, 2001: 40). The ritual dance where horses are considered solar, can also be found in the tradition of other people: the Germans have Pferd-Ritters, the French have Cheval Japon and the English have the famous Hobby Horse.

“The part of the caballine god is played by Mut and the effigies are the Flag of Căluș and the Beak of Căluș. His divine entourage is a male group with strict hierarchy (foreman, foreman aid, flag bearer, călușari), with handsome men who by their traditional clothing (...), name, simulation of horse trample and gallop while dancing, gestures etc. try to resemble or intermingle with the horses. Although Mut wears a mask representing an old man or a goat, he has a wooden phallus attached to the belt by which he fertilizes the sterile women by mere touch” (GHINOIU, 2001: 41).

According to the tradition, the flag of Călușarii, the symbol of the magic power that they temporarily hold, must be carefully guarded. If the flag disappears, all the members of the group will go mad, that is they will catch the very same disease that they normally cure. The birth and the death of the god Căluș once in a year are indissolubly connected to this magic attire, the flag of Călușarii, a thin and flexible rod of hazel wood, on top of which a headgear is attached, inside of which green garlic is hidden, three bundles for each călușar. The birth of Căluș is ritually marked by Flag Binding, Flag Chosing, Flag Rising or the Vow. Upon the death of Căluș the flag is torn into pieces and buried: the Burrial of Căluș. This final ritual deed represents, in addition to the evanescence of the god Căluș for one year, the elimination for the same period, of the threat represented by Rusalii. Generated by popular imagination, Rusalii and Călușul succeeded in preserving themselves intact over the centuries; they are vehicles of the signs revealing Romanian identity, giving evidence of times about which, at least so far, unfortunately we know very little.
